PREFACE

THE views about ancient India now held by scholars are based upon an examination of the Veda and Vedic literature, to the neglect of Purānic and epic tradition; that is, ancient Indian history has been fashioned out of compositions, which are purely religious and priestly, which notoriously do not deal with history, and which totally lack the historical sense. The extraordinary nature of such history may be perceived, if it were suggested that European history should be constructed merely out of theological literature. What would raise a smile if applied to Europe has been soberly accepted when applied to India. This contrast is full justification for a consideration of what historical tradition has to tell us, and the results obtained from an examination of Purānic and epic tradition as well as of the Rigveda and Vedic literature are set out in the following pages.

Nothing herein has been the outcome of preconceived ideas, speculation, or haste. It began with a study of the epics and Purāṇas for geographical information about ancient India thirty years ago, during the translation of the Mārkandeya Purāṇa, in order to elucidate its geographical chapters. Geography included political divisions, and led to an examination of ancient kingdoms, and so on to their dynastic genealogies and traditions—subjects that were generally regarded as of little or no historical value, and were practically neglected. With no views about ancient Indian historical tradition, and a desire merely to see whether there was any substance in it, it was collected, compared, and studied, and inferences were drawn therefrom, revised continually with fresh material, and discarded freely if they proved untenable—which is simply the scientific process of collecting and testing facts copiously before forming any opinion or theory. At length some substance and order seemed to manifest themselves, and certain results gradually took shape; and some of these have been published in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society during the last fourteen years. These results developed with further study in various directions, especially on the religious side, and all have been revised and recast repeatedly, as their mutual relations became more complex, with fresh material from all sources.

The outcome of all these inquiries is set out here. No conclusion is put forward but what is based upon definite statements, and the authorities for every statement are cited. The results are totally different from the views now held by scholars as noticed above; yet there is nothing in them, as far as I am aware, really inconsistent with the most ancient book we possess, namely, the Rigveda, and they throw much new light thereon, and on all problems concerning ancient India. It remains however to be seen how far Professor M. Bloomfield's recent book, Rig-Veda Repetitions, which should lead to some solid chronological results, will support what tradition indicates regarding the order of rishis.

No pains have been spared to verify the references and make them complete and accurate. Unfortunately a few errors escaped notice in the proof-reading, and a considerable number of typographical blemishes have crept into the finally printed page, mostly the loss of diaeritical marks which have failed or broken off in the printing, such as the stroke over the capital palatal sibilant, and the long mark over capital vowels. All these are exhibited in the list of Corrigenda at the end. I trust there are none others overlooked, yet feel sure that, if there are any, whether in the text or in the map, they can be readily corrected, and will not create any doubt as to what is intended.

My sincere thanks are given to the University of Oxford and the Government of India for generous help towards lightening the cost of this book for the benefit of readers.

GENERAL SURVEY OF ANCIENT INDIAN HISTORICAL TRADITION

यो विद्याच्चतुरो वेदान्साङ्गोपनिषदो द्विजः ।

THE brahman, who may know the four Vedas with the Āngas and Upaniṣads, should not really be (regarded as) having attained proficiency, if he should not thoroughly know the Purāna. He should reinforce the Veda with the Itihāsa and Purāna. The Veda is afraid of him who is deficient in tradition,<sup>2</sup> (thinking) 'he will do me hurt'.

Our knowledge of the most ancient times in India rests mainly on tradition. We know from the evidence of language that the Aryans entered India very early, and established themselves ultimately throughout North India and in the north-west of the Dekhan, so that the history of those times is bound up closely with the Aryan conquest. The Purāṇas, the Mahābhārata and in a minor degree the Rāmāyaṇa profess to give accounts from tradition about the earliest occurrences. The Vedas, the Brāhmaṇas and other brahmanic literature supply information also. The oldest of these, the Rigveda, contains historical allusions, of which some record contemporary persons and events, but more refer to bygone times and persons and are obviously based on tradition. Almost all the information therefore comes from tradition.

<sup>1</sup> Vā 1, 200-1. Pad v, 2, 50-2. Śiv v, 1, 35. MBh has the two verses separately, the first (modified) in i, 2, 645, and the second in i, 1, 260.

Ancient India has bequeathed to us no historical works. 'History is the one weak spot in Indian literature. It is, in fact, non-existent. The total lack of the historical sense is so characteristic, that the whole course of Sanskrit literature is darkened by the shadow of this defect, suffering as it does from an entire absence of exact chronology.'<sup>1</sup> This is especially true of the brahmanic literature, for it has been truly said, 'That the Vedic texts, the Samhitās and the Brāhmaṇas, are not books of historical purpose is notorious,' nor do they deal with history.<sup>2</sup>

The evidence in the Rigveda, whether contemporary notices or matter concerning the past borrowed from tradition, consists of statements more or less isolated; they are merely allusions and make up no connected account. Even the contemporary notices, though having all the trustworthiness of first-hand evidence, yet fix little or nothing definitely of themselves, because they have no certain chronological setting with reference to other events. The same remarks hold good for the brahmanical literature later than the Rigveda. This may be illustrated by the contemporary information about king Sudās in the Rigveda.

It tells us of his battle with the ten kings, but that event cannot be assigned to any definite time unless we know when he lived; and there is the widest difference, whether it took place (as scholars believe at present) when the Aryans were in the Panjab conquering their way into India, and was a battle between them and the hostile races who opposed their eastward advance; or whether it took place (as tradition indicates) long after the Aryans had established themselves in N. India, and was a battle between Sudāsa (Sudās), king of North Pañcāla, and other Aryan and non-Aryan kings who opposed his westward conquests. There is nothing in the Rigveda to fix his position chronologically, but there are plain statements in the genealogies and tradition which assign him a definite place in the scheme of Aryan expansion in North India.

Even contemporary historical notices in the Rigveda therefore remain chronologically vague, and by themselves yield little information that can be co-ordinated for historical purposes. Statements of an historical kind in the Vedic literature become serviceable, if they can be linked up with other statements from elsewhere, and that can be only from tradition. It is tradition that gives many of them a chronological position ; hence the soundness and force of the counsel given in the verses prefixed to this chapter are manifest. Tradition therefore becomes all-important. It is the only resource, since historical works are wanting, and is not an untrustworthy guide. In ancient times men knew perfectly well the difference between truth and falsehood, as abundant proverbs and sayings show. It was natural therefore that they should discriminate what was true and preserve it ; and historical tradition must be considered in this light. This will be noticed farther on.

The Aryans could not have established themselves in India without long and arduous warfare. Among the hostile races who possessed the country before them were not only rude tribes but also communities in a higher state of civilization (chapter XXV). The Aryans not only subdued them, but also gradually cleared much of the country of the forests which occupied a large portion of its surface, so as to render it fit for themselves, their cattle and their cultivation.

Their wars, their conquests and the founding of new kingdoms all implied that there were victorious kings, whose lineage and exploits would have been sung in many a ksatriya ballad.<sup>1</sup> With their territorial expansion their religion naturally extended its sphere. Political supremacy fostered religious ascendancy, and rishis<sup>2</sup> and munis, protected and favoured by royal power and Aryan prestige, spread and propagated their doctrines and observances, not only in the countries conquered, but also in the surrounding regions beyond the actual Aryan sway. Thus they gradually brought the alien peoples and tribes under the influence of Aryan beliefs and customs. This process has prevailed to the present day, and along with it another process must have been going on also, which likewise has continued to the present day, namely, the Aryans met with religious practices and beliefs among the peoples whom they ruled over or came into lasting contact with, and have assimilated some of them gradually, thus modifying their own religion to a certain extent.

Their victorious career must have given rise to abundant tradition of all kinds, warlike, religious and peaceful, and tradition must have grown with their expansion and the length of their occupation. Naturally it was impossible to remember all the accumulated traditions, much dropped out, and only what was important or specially interesting to kings, priests and people was preserved. Consequently the principal matters that would have survived would be (speaking generally) the genealogies of great dynasties, ballads and stories about famous kings and eminent rishis, and accounts of the chief popular religious beliefs and observances. Kings and rishis therefore were the prominent figures, and it is mainly with them that ancient traditions deal.

There was, however, the widest difference between kings and rishis. Kings occupied settled countries and towns. The rishis were not confined to any place, but wandered into woods and hills and wilds to practise asceticism and a religious life in order to form and enhance their sacred character. The conditions of a king's life were fixed. The rishi was independent; spiritual eminence being his aim, he sought out when young the teaching of a distinguished preceptor and, when he had completed his novitiate, was free to establish his hermitage where he pleased or to seek the patronage of some king who might welcome his ministrations. The kings inherited the throne of celebrated ancestors, whose memory and fame they cherished with pride and sought to emulate. The rishis came from well-known families indeed, but that birthright merely entitled them to acquire religious lore, and their advancement depended wholly on their own faculties. To maintain their lineage and dynasties was the natural and ardent wish of kings; hence the great desire that is often mentioned among kings to have sons. Rishis perpetuated their sacred lore and fame through their disciples, among whom might be their own sons if capable.

One indication of this difference is the fact that, while kings are treated genealogically, brahmanic succession is reckoned by the line of teaching as shown in the lists of religious teachers set out in the Brāhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad,<sup>1</sup> Satapatha Brāhmaṇa,<sup>2</sup> &c.<sup>3</sup> Marriage alliances were matters of high importance with kings and are often noticed. As regards rishis, though the names of the wives of certain have been preserved, yet very little is ever said about their marriages except when they married princesses; and strange stories are told about rishis, which indicate that their marital relations were not seldom erratic and their lineage by no means pure.<sup>1</sup>

The result is displayed in the epics and Purāṇas on the one side and in the Vedic literature on the other. Sacred lore is the subject of that literature, and references to secular matters are generally incidental for the purpose of illustrating some religious point. The ancient portion of the Purāṇas consists largely, as will be shown in chapter III, of the royal genealogies and kṣatriya ballads and tales, while most of their teaching on religious matters was added by brahmans in later times. Dynastic accounts and heroic tales were the principal subjects of the kṣatriya record. Royal genealogies are found in thirteen Purāṇas, the epics and the Harivamśa; but brahman genealogies hardly exist and are most meagre. The former give long lists of kings, but among rishi families it is rare to find more than three or four descents remembered, and the longest rishi pedigree is that of Vyāsa's family with six descents. Further it is noteworthy that, in cases where a king became a brahman, his kṣatriya descent is given fairly fully, but the succeeding brahman pedigree stops short or is dissipated into a mere list of gotra names, as is especially noticeable in the famous case of Viśvāmitra.<sup>2</sup>

Such were the widely different conditions of kings and rishis. The secular business of kings, their wars and exploits, naturally had little interest for rishis, who dwelt apart from the world and were affected little and only indirectly by political changes. On the other hand, though eminent rishis commanded veneration from kings and their services were at times keenly solicited and handsomely rewarded, yet the religious doctrines of the rishis lay generally outside the purview of kings, unless they were brahmanyā, 'brahmanically-minded'. Such was the attitude of the people also at large.

The foregoing considerations show that there must have been abundant tradition about kings and their exploits, and also much tradition about rishis and their doings; but it is obvious that in such different conditions the traditions about kings and those about rishis must have been correspondingly separate, that is, there must have been two great streams of distinct tradition, kṣatriya tradition and brahmanic tradition. It is absurd to suppose that all the genuine kṣatriya tradition has been lost or utterly corrupted, and that the traditions which we have now are spurious. If the brahmans could and did preserve their religious compositions with the most scrupulous care and fidelity, it is absurd to suppose the opposite about kṣatriya tradition, when (as will be shown in chapter II) there were men whose business it was to preserve such tradition. The general trustworthiness of tradition is the fact demonstrated, wherever it has been possible to test tradition by the results of discoveries and excavations, and we should distrust scepticism born of ignorance. The position now is this—there is a strong presumption in favour of tradition ; if any one contests tradition, the burden lies on him to show that it is wrong ; and, till he does that, tradition holds the field.

The distinction between kṣatriya and brahmanic tradition is very important. It is entirely natural, and there would be matter for wonder if it had not existed, because the Vedic literature confines itself to religious subjects, and notices political and secular occurrences only incidentally so far as they had a bearing on the religious subjects ; and it is absurd to suppose that that literature contains all the genuine tradition that existed about political and secular occurrences, such as those involved in the Aryan conquest of North India and those revealed partially in the Rigveda. The very fact that that literature deals almost exclusively with brahmanic thought and action implies that there must have been a body of other tradition dealing with the kṣatriyas and the great part that they played during that conquest and in the political life that was the outcome of it.<sup>1</sup> The distinction existed from the earliest times, until the original Purāṇa was compiled and passed into the custody of the Purāṇic brahmans, as will be explained in chapter II. It is strikingly illustrated in two ways, first, by comparing the notices of kings and rishis in the epic and Purāṇic literature and in the Vedic literature, and secondly, by the difference between the two kinds of tradition. The former is discussed here, and the latter will be dealt with in chapter V.

Famous kings in the epics and Purāṇas were Māndhāṭṛ, Hariścandra, Sagara, Bhagiratha, Daśaratha and Rāma of Ayodhyā ;

Śaśabindu and Arjuna Kārtavirya among Yādavas; Duṣyanta, Bharata, Ajamīḍha, Kuru and Santanu among Pauravas; Jahnu and Gādhi of Kānyakubja; Divodāsa and Pratardana of Kāśi; Vasu Caidya of Cedi and Magadha; Marutta Āvikṣita and Trṇabindu of the Vaiśāla kingdom; and Uśinara and Śivi of the Panjab Ānavas.<sup>1</sup> All were great monarchs, some of them great conquerors, and many (it is said) great sacrificers. The Rigvedic canon was not closed till after their times, because it contains a hymn by Devāpi, brother (or cousin) of king Śantanu; yet none of those kings are mentioned in the hymns except Bharata,<sup>2</sup> Śantanu,<sup>3</sup> apparently Ajamīḍha<sup>4</sup> and Māndhāṭr,<sup>5</sup> and possibly Rāma,<sup>6</sup> while x, 134 is attributed to Māndhāṭr, and in x, 179, verse 1 is assigned to Śivi and verse 2 to Pratardana.

This difference is the more remarkable, because those kings did not all miss laudation for want of rishis. The Vasiṣṭhas were hereditary priests of Ayodhyā, and various members of their family are mentioned in close connexion with Hariścandra, Sagara and Daśaratha. Arjuna Kārtavirya was favoured by Datta Ātreyā.<sup>7</sup> Marutta Āvikṣita had Saṁvarta Āṅgirasa for his priest,<sup>8</sup> and a Vasiṣṭha was minister to Kuru's father Saṁvarāṇa.<sup>9</sup> It can hardly be supposed that none of those rishis was capable of composing a hymn, nor that no rishis existed who might have celebrated the others of those kings. The absence of laudation is particularly noticeable in the case of Bharata. He is the only one of those great kings who is really extolled in Vedic literature, and yet no contemporary hymn in his honour exists. He reigned in central Madhyadeśa and seems to have been eminently brahmanyā; and some of his descendants, Gārgyas, Sāṅkṛtyas and others, became brahmans, as will be shown in chapter XXIII.

On the other hand, the kings who are lauded in the Rigveda are hardly known to kṣatriya fame. Some, such as Vadhryaśva, Divodāsa, Śrījaya, Sudās, Sahadeva and Somaka are mentioned as kings in the North Pañcāla genealogy,<sup>10</sup> but nothing particular is recorded in the epics and Purāṇas about any of them except Somaka, and the story told of him is not creditable.<sup>1</sup> Others again such as Abhyāvartin Cāyamāna, Śrutarvan Ārksa, Plāyogi Āsaṅga and Svanaya Bhāvya, are absolutely unknown to the genealogies, the epics and the Purāṇas. The explanation of this difference is that the hymns celebrate, not the really great kings, but those who specially favoured and enriched poetical rishis. The praise is no measure of the king's greatness or fame, but rather the rishi's grateful laudation of the king's dignity and generosity. A king, though undistinguished, who secured the services of a poetical rishi and rewarded him liberally, might naturally obtain such praise.<sup>2</sup>

Similar remarks hold good with regard to the rishis celebrated in the Rigveda and in the epics and Purāṇas, though the difference is naturally not so wide, because the latter in praising them approximate to Vedic matter. Great rishis mentioned in the latter were Reika, Jamadagni and his son Rāma among the Bhārgavas; the Vasiṣṭhas of Trīśaṅku and Hariścandra, of Sagara and of Kalmāṣapāda, all of Ayodhyā, and also Parāśara; Datta and Durvāsas of the Ātreyas; Bṛhaspati, Saimvarta, Dirghatamas and Bharadvāja among the Āṅgirasas; the first and great Viśvāmitra and Agastya: yet no hymns are attributed to some of them, and the portions attributed to others are meagre. Dirghatamas, Parāśara, Bharadvāja, Agastya, Viśvāmitra, Atri and Vasiṣṭha are credited with many hymns, yet these names appear to be merely gotra and not personal names except the first two. On the other hand many rishis, to whom numerous hymns are ascribed, such as Madhucchandas, Kaṇva, Medhātithi, Kakṣivant, Gr̥tsamada, Vāmadeva and Asita, are mentioned in the epics and Purāṇas, though little definite is said about them. The majority of reputed authors are unknown to those works.

The Vedic literature gives us notices of ancient times from the brahmanic and religious points of view, and kṣatriya tradition enables us to picture ancient India and its political conditions from the kṣatriya standpoint. The kṣatriyas manifestly played the most important part in the Aryan conquest of India, and if we wish to discover and estimate what their position and achievements were, it is essential to study their traditions, for, as will be shown, the Purāṇic genealogies, and they alone, give an account how the Aila race dominated all the regions to which we assign the Aryan occupation, while the brahmanic literature contains no inkling whatever of that great transformation.

Vedic literature not only lacks the historical sense as pointed out above (p. 2), but is not always to be trusted in matters that concerned brahmanical claims and pretensions. The greatest brahmanical book is the Rigveda. It is a compilation of hymns composed by many authors and is arranged according to certain principles. It must manifestly have been compiled and arranged by some one or more persons, yet Vedic literature says absolutely nothing about this. The brahmans cannot have been ignorant about it, for they preserved it and its text with unparalleled care; they certainly did not accept and venerate this canon blindly upon uncertain authority, and they must have known who compiled it and established its text.<sup>1</sup> This is made clearer by another fact, namely, that Vedic literature professes to know and declares the names of the authors of nearly all the hymns and even of single verses, yet it ignores all knowledge of the person or persons who afterwards compiled and arranged those hymns. To suppose that, when it preserved the earlier information, it was ignorant of the later work in so vital a matter is ridiculous. Plainly therefore Vedic literature has deliberately suppressed all information on these matters.

Epic and Purānic tradition unanimously and repeatedly declares that the Veda was 'arranged' by the great rishi, Parāśara's son Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana, who was consequently renowned by the name Vyāsa.<sup>2</sup> Yet Vedic literature is remarkably reticent about him, for the Vedic Index mentions no such Kṛṣṇa, no Dvaipāyana, and the only Vyāsa noticed is Vyāsa Pārūṣarya, and all it says about him is that this 'is the name of a mythical sage who in the Vedic period is found only as a pupil of Viṣvaksena in the Vāṁśa (list of teachers) at the end of the Sāmavidhāna Brāhmaṇa and in the late Taittirīya Āraṇyaka'.<sup>3</sup> The Mahābhārata and Purāṇas are full of Vyāsa and habitually refer to him as 'Vyāsa', and it is incredible that all they say about him is pure fiction. It is beyond doubt that the Vedic literature has deliberately ignored him; there is a conspiracy of silence in it both about the compilation of the Rigveda and about the pre-eminent rishi who is declared to have 'arranged' it. The reason is patent. The brahmans put forward the doctrine that the Veda existed from everlasting, hence to admit that any one had compiled or even arranged it struck at the root of their doctrine and was in common parlance, 'to give their whole case away.'

<sup>2</sup> e.g. MBh i, 63, 2417; 105, 4236. Vā 60, 11-12. Viṣ iii. 4. 2. Kūr i, 52, 10. Acknowledged in the brahmanical Sānti-parvan, MBh xii, 342, 13025, 13119.

These considerations show how little trust can be placed in the Vedic literature as regards any matter which the brahmans found awkward for their pretensions. When they suppressed facts of the greatest moment, it was a light thing to distort smaller matters.<sup>1</sup>

Historical tradition in the Vedic literature has one great merit over that in the epics and Purāṇas, namely, that that literature has been very carefully preserved and what it contains now is what it contained when it was composed, so that its statements are statements of that time. Hence there is a strong presumption that its statements being ancient are nearer accuracy than statements in the epics and Purāṇas which were not so scrupulously preserved. But the presumption is seriously weakened by three well-known facts, (1) that literature deals with religious matters and is not of historical purpose nor does it deal with history (p. 2); (2) the brahmans, its authors, lacked the historical sense; and (3) they lived in secluded hermitages, and so lacked clear knowledge. The first two of these facts have been discussed above, and the third will be noticed more fully in chapter V, but one illustration of it may be mentioned here. The brahmanical story of Śunahṣepa<sup>2</sup> speaks of the most famous city Ayodhyā as a village (grāma)!<sup>3</sup>

With such grave defects the presumption virtually disappears, and two instances may be cited in which the brahmanical books are wrong, both taken from that story, which affords special opportunities for testing brahmanical accuracy. It says that the sacrifice of Śunahṣepa was a rājasūya, and the first Viśvāmitra is there styled Bharata-rsabha. Now the sacrifice was not a rājasūya, because Hariścandra had been reigning then some twenty-five years, the real rājasūya took place early in his reign, and the sacrifice of Śunahṣepa was merely the belated fulfilment of a special vow. The appellation Bharata-rṣalha, 'leader of the Bharatas,' was impossible, because the Bharatas were Viśvāmitra's descendants and had not come into existence then, as will be shown in chapter IX.<sup>1</sup> Statements in Vedic literature therefore, though ancient, may be incorrect, and, if wrong originally, no amount of careful preservation can make them true. Besides, priestly tampering must not be forgotten, as shown above with regard to Vyāsa.

Though historical works about ancient India are wanting, yet tradition has handed down fairly copious genealogies of the ancient dynasties. These state the succession of kings, and in that way are historical. They are almost the only historical data found in Sanskrit books as regards ancient political development; and the lists of teachers in professed chronological order set out in some brahmanical books supply evidence as regards brahmanical succession. The genealogies form the basis by which the investigation of tradition for historical ends may be tested. They supply the best chronological clue, for the Vedic literature, as shown above, is not a sure guide in historical matters.

Great importance has been attached to historical statements in the Vedic literature, even when not contemporaneous and when based on tradition, and epic and Purāṇic tradition has been discredited, however numerous and clear may be its statements about any particular matter. Such exaltation of Vedic literature and depreciation of epic and Purāṇic tradition has led to surprising conclusions. Tradition in many passages tells of an early and well-known king of Ayodhyā named Satyavrata Triśaṅku, who was the subject of a famous contest between Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra,<sup>2</sup> and the Taittiriya Brāhmaṇa (i, 10, 6) merely names an obscure religious teacher Triśaṅku (who belonged to a far later time); yet it has been said, 'The confusion of the chronology in the tales of Triśaṅku is a good example of the worthlessness of the supposed epic tradition'.<sup>3</sup> An apt parallel to the two Triśaṅkus occurs in Saul king of Israel and Saul (Paul) the religious teacher; yet would any one say—the confusion of the chronology in the tales of Saul is a good example of the worthlessness of the supposed historical books of the Old Testament?

Exaltation of Vedic literature has drawn historical conclusions even from its silence. It is not of historical purpose and does not deal with history (p. 2), hence its silence about historical points is of no significance, and to draw historical conclusions from its mere silence is astonishing. Two illustrations of this may be adduced.

First, it is said with reference to Yayāti, 'There is no trace whatever of his connexion with Pūru, as in the Epic, the tradition of which must be deemed to be inaccurate'.<sup>1</sup> Would any one argue—there is no trace whatever in the Book of Psalms of David's connexion with Solomon, as in the historical books of the Old Testament, the statement of which must be deemed to be inaccurate?

A few words may be said about the argument from silence, and the second example will illustrate them. Some matter, say A, is mentioned, and nothing is said about another matter, say B; and the question is, whether the silence regarding B proves anything against it. If B is closely connected with or directly related to A, it would naturally arise with A, and we should expect to hear of it along with A, so that, if it is not mentioned, the silence is strange and is cogent evidence against B. But if B is apart from A and has no concern with it, there is no reason why it should ordinarily be mentioned with A, so that the silence is natural and indicates nothing. The criterion is, whether in the particular circumstances silence is unnatural or not. If unnatural, it is significant; if natural, it has no significance in this respect.

The second illustration is this. The epics and Purāṇas repeatedly declare that the first Viśvāmitra was a king who became a brahman, but 'there is no trace of his kingship in the Rigveda'; and, though it is supported even by brahmanical books such as the Nirukta and the Aitareya and Pañcavimśa Brāhmaṇas, yet the conclusion has been drawn, 'that there is no real trace of this kingship of Viśvāmitra: it may probably be dismissed as a mere legend, with no more foundation at most than that Viśvāmitra was of a family which once had been royal. But even this is doubtful'.<sup>2</sup> Now, after Viśvāmitra had renounced his kṣatriya status and kingdom and become a brahman, neither he nor his descendants had any motive to refer to that discarded past in any Vedic hymns, which he or they may have composed as rishis in circumstances that had nothing to do with that past and were alien to it, while other rishis had no concern with it. It would have been surprising if his kingship had been mentioned in such circumstances, and it is entirely natural that there should be no mention of it in the Rigveda. The non-mention of it there is not only no reason for discrediting the tradition but it is in exact keeping with what would be expected if the tradition were true. The tradition therefore stands unshaken.<sup>1</sup>

The foregoing considerations suggest some remarks on the way in which ancient Indian historical tradition should be treated. It is not to be put aside as wholly unworthy of attention, nor is it to be summarily explained by prima facie comments. The former course is not criticism but is mere prejudging the matter, and the latter is superficial observation. It is not to be interpreted by way of personification and allegory, as that the story of Rāma's doings in S. India and Ceylon represents the spread of Aryan civilization in the south. That is akin to euhemerism, and shirks real examination by suggesting a specious theory. Nor is it to be scrutinized for defects and discrepancies and so promptly discredited. All human testimony is liable to error, and tradition is human testimony concerning the long past: hence it is not to be discarded simply because it contains discrepancies. Ancient Indian historical tradition must be examined and weighed with the aid of all information available and of experience and common sense. It was preserved by the sūtas or bards and when collected into the Purāṇa soon passed into the hands of the Purāṇic brahmans, as will be shown in the next chapter. The attitude of the latter to ancient matters differed from that of the former, and changed still more as time went on through the causes that will be explained in chapter V, taking more and more a brahmanical colouring, so that generally the more brahmanical a statement is, the later or less trustworthy it is. This will appear, for instance, from the variations in the descriptions of the Dānavas, Daityas and Rākṣasas.<sup>2</sup> The older accounts treat them as men, the late brahmanical as demons.

Hitherto opinions about ancient India have been based on a study of the Veda and Vedic literature without much regard for historical tradition outside that. Historical tradition yields very different conclusions. To make the former the chief and authoritative basis of historical reconstruction is much the same as to write European history mainly from theological works—an undertaking that would not receive a moment's acceptance; yet that is how ancient India has been treated, and the results have been regarded with satisfaction. Vedic literature is not authoritative in historical matters (except where it notices contemporary matters), and conclusions drawn from it are not criteria for estimating the results yielded by historical tradition in the epics and Purāṇas. Those results are set out in the following pages and must be judged independently on their own merits. I have not drawn information from Buddhist and Jain literature, because it is of no real help: it is religious, does not deal with history any more than Vedic literature, and having diverged from the main course of Indian religion had largely lost touch with ancient tradition.

In the following chapters I endeavour to deal fully with ancient Indian historical tradition, basing my statements always on definite statements in Sanskrit books and citing those authorities; and no statements are made without such support.<sup>1</sup> The chief authorities are the Purāṇas and the Mahābhārata, and less reliably the Rāmāyaṇa; and as the first are continually mentioned, the word is Anglicized as Purana. Among the Puranas is reckoned the Harivaiṁśa which is really a Purana. The Puranas are cited by name,<sup>2</sup> and the Mahābhārata in the Calcutta edition.<sup>3</sup> References are cited as copiously as possible, so that all passages may be combined and receive due consideration, because, when tradition is dealt with, the quantity and character of the statements about any particular matter are important in the way of evidence. The same matter or person has often to be noticed in different aspects or connexions, and cross-references have been given as far as practicable, yet it is impossible in the early pages to particularize later pages. A copious index is added, which will aid comparison, so that all the information on any particular subject may be collected, and the book serve as a compendium of ancient historical tradition.

OF THE PURANAS

THE Vāyu and Padma Puranas tell us how ancient genealogies, tales and ballads were preserved, namely, by the sūtas, and they describe the sūta's duty. Their statements are different versions of the same original. The Vāyu (1, 31-2) says<sup>1</sup>—‘The sūta's special duty as perceived by good men of old was to preserve the genealogies of gods, rishis and most glorious kings, and the traditions of great men, which are displayed by those who declare sacred lore in the Itihāsas and Puranas.’ The Padma (v, 1, 27-8) says similarly,<sup>2</sup> but in a later and inferior version—‘This is the sūta's duty from primaeval time as perceived by good men, to compose the genealogies of gods, rishis and most glorious kings and the eulogies of great men, who are seen as declarers of sacred lore in the Itihāsas and Puranas.’ In the Vāyu's statement śruta obviously means ‘tradition’ and not ‘celebrated’, as the corresponding word stuti in the Padma version shows, and the meaning ‘celebrated’ yields poor sense. The sūtas would have, as bards have generally, preserved ballads and songs as well as genealogies. Śruta here does not mean ‘sacred tradition’, but simply ‘tradition’, for it is often used so in the Puranas, as will be shown. Stuti in the Padma would generally mean a ‘ballad in praise of’, and eulogies of and ballads about great men of the past would naturally be one subject of tradition.<sup>3</sup> Eulogistic ballads are found, as those in praise of Arjuna Kārtavīrya,<sup>1</sup> Alarka,<sup>2</sup> Devāvṛdha<sup>3</sup> and others. Further the word brahma in both versions does not necessarily mean Vedic or brahmanic lore, but means Puranic lore, both because of the subjects mentioned and because the Puranas assert themselves to be brahma<sup>4</sup> and place themselves on an equality with the Veda, as will be shown at the end of this chapter. The Vāyu's statement is the older and appears to be the more trustworthy version, yet both come to practically the same effect for the present purpose.

The sūta mentioned here is not the caste that was described as the offspring of a kṣatriya father and brahman mother;<sup>5</sup> that was a later application of the term. This sūta was a bard, like the māgadha, and the origin of both is placed in the time of a primaeval king Pṛthu, son of Vena.<sup>6</sup> It is explained by a fable, which says the first sūta and māgadha came into existence at his sacrifice, and gives a fanciful explanation of the names. What is noteworthy is that the story says Pṛthu assigned the Anūpa (or Sūta) country to the sūta and Magadha to the māgadha;<sup>7</sup> and this discloses that the māgadhas were really inhabitants of Magadha and the sūtas inhabitants of the Anūpa country which appears to mean Bengal here, or of the Sūta country, the district east of Magadha. The story clearly distinguishes between these sūtas and the later class sprung from kṣatriya fathers and brahman mothers which also was called sūta, and explains that the latter received this name because they observed the same duty as the original sūtas, while they were also allowed two other inferior occupations, namely, secondly, employment with a kṣatriya in connexion with chariots, elephants and horses, and lastly, medicine.<sup>1</sup> The original sūtas seem to have been gradually superseded by the latter class.

The sūtas are often classed with māgadhas and vandins, even in descriptions of ancient times,<sup>2</sup> and distinctions are sometimes made between these three classes. One statement makes the sūta a paurāṇikz, the māgadha a genealogist (vāṁśa-śāṁsaka), and the vandin a eulogist (stāvaka).<sup>3</sup> Another makes the two latter eulogists and says much the same of the sūta also.<sup>4</sup> A third passage says that from Pr̥thu's time the sūtas and māgadhas, who both came into existence then, were royal panegyrists, and they and the vandins awakened the king in the morning with their blessings.<sup>5</sup> The Mahābhārata has other expressions.<sup>6</sup>

The distinction between the original sūtas and māgadhas and the two later mixed castes which were dubbed sūta and māgadha is clearly noticed in the Kautiliya Arthaśāstra. When dealing with pratiloma offspring it says that the offspring of a vaiśya and women of the two higher castes are the māgadha and vaidehaka; and that of a kṣatriya and a brahman woman is the sūta.<sup>7</sup> Then it adds, 'But the sūta who is mentioned in the Puranas is different, and so also is the māgadha who is mentioned there, from brāhmaṇa-kṣatriya offspring by a real distinction':<sup>8</sup> that is, in the Puranas the sūta is different from the sūta who is the offspring of a brahman woman by a kṣatriya, and the māgadha from the māgadha who is the offspring of a kṣatriya woman by a vaiśya. Here the Paurāṇika sūta and māgadha are clearly distinguished from the pratiloma sūta and māgadha; and the reference to them as Paurāṇika plainly suggests that they were only known from the Puranas in Kauṭilya's time and had ceased to exist then, in the fourth century B.C.

A remote antiquity was thus assigned to the original sūtas, who were royal and other bards and held an honourable position; and that is true because bards existed in various countries in the earliest times and were highly esteemed. It was thus their duty to preserve the genealogies of gods, rishis and famous kings and the ballads about celebrated men<sup>1</sup>—which were all matters of ancient tradition; and this statement of their duty refers obviously to the earliest times before the Purana was compiled, because there would have been no genealogies or ballads to collect and fashion into the Purana, unless they had been preserving such ancient traditions all along. The genealogies of kings and rishis are referred to as really existing and as well known to those who were learned in ancient lore.<sup>2</sup> The sūta had no duty with regard to the Vedas.<sup>3</sup>

Tradition is cited by various expressions. Smṛta, 'remembered,' is the most common, and often has little force, but sometimes its use is emphatic, as in the statements that Viśvāmitra was remembered as having had the (kṣatriya) name Viśvaratha,<sup>4</sup> and that Śukra-Uśanas had the name Kāvya.<sup>5</sup> Similarly anuśuśrūma, 'we have heard it handed down,' occurs fairly often.<sup>6</sup> Abundant is the use of the phrase iti naḥ śrutam,<sup>1</sup> 'so we have heard,' or shortly iti śrutam,<sup>2</sup> and its equivalent occurs often, iti śrutih,<sup>3</sup> 'such is the tradition,' where śruta and śruti refer to secular tradition.

kṣatriyas', e.g. MBh xii, 65, 2430; Mat 47, 32; 273, 61, 63; Vā 99, 443, 446; Br 45, 35; 123, 6: and with reference to the Aila race which being kṣatriya gave rise to kṣatriyan brahmans and brahmans, Mat 50, 88; Vā 99, 278. Sometimes it means a blending of the two, as where kṣatriya kings became brahmans, e.g. Vā 57, 121 (cf. Mat 143, 37); Hv 27, 1469; 32, 1773; Br 10, 63: or where a brahman became practically a kṣatriya, like Rāma Jāmadagnya, Vā 65, 94; Bd iii, 1, 98.

Śruti generally means 'sacred text' or 'sacred tradition', but in the Puranas very often means ordinary tradition and not sacred tradition, because the phrase iti śrutih occurs too often to be a clerical mistake, and because matters on which it is cited do not appear to be mentioned or even alluded to in the Vedic literature. For instance, the Vāyu (88, 28) says, 'Bṛhadāśva's son was Kuvalāśva, such is the śruti'; and both the Brahma (8, 68) and Harivamśa (15, 802) say, one of king Sagara's two wives brought forth a gourd (out of which developed 60,000 sons), such is the śruti: but these citations are wholly unknown to Vedic literature.<sup>4</sup> Again the Matsya (47, 186) says that Devayāni was born from Kāvya, such is the śruti, and the Rāmāyana says of king Asita of Ayodhyā (called Bīhu in the Puranas), 'his two wives were with child, such is the śruti',<sup>5</sup> though Vedic literature knows nothing about either statement.

Those notices refer to genealogical matters,<sup>6</sup> and śruti is found used similarly regarding other matters. Thus the Padma (v, 11, 69-71) quotes a long-enduring śruti, that a son who goes to Gayā will please his seven paternal ancestors and also others of his maternal grandfathers. The Brahma (175, 35) declares Umā is queen of the three worlds and mother of the world, such is the well-known śruti. The former is not known to Vedic tradition, nor apparently is the latter.

The phrase iti śrutih is also the authority adduced for many statements of various kinds, which do not appear to come from sacred tradition, such as these: that Viṣṇu is infinite;<sup>7</sup> that the Purana should be heard daily;<sup>8</sup> that Yayāti attained to heaven a second time;<sup>1</sup> that there is no unrighteousness greater than theft;<sup>2</sup> and others.<sup>3</sup>

This meaning of śruti does not, I believe, occur in later brahmanic additions nor in the latest Puranas that are frankly sectarian. In passages enunciating purely brahmanic matter, which are later additions, śruti appears in its ordinary brahmanic sense and is generally restricted to 'sacred text or tradition',<sup>4</sup> as for instance in the brahmanic māhātmya of the river Godāvāri called Gautamī Gaṅgā,<sup>5</sup> and when it is contrasted with smṛti,<sup>6</sup> and in other brahmanic passages;<sup>7</sup> also it is used at times with the word Veda, seemingly as meaning 'sacred tradition'.<sup>8</sup> Sometimes its precise import is not quite clear.<sup>9</sup>

Similar remarks apply to the word śruta in such connexions, where it has its brahmanic sense generally.<sup>10</sup> Iti naḥ śrutam is then applied to late mystic doctrine.<sup>11</sup> Śrutam and iti śrutam are used sometimes in tales and fables about tīrthas in order apparently to give them a semblance of ancient tradition,<sup>12</sup> just as Veda-vids are cited as vouching for the sanctity of tīrthas on the Godāvāri;<sup>13</sup> and it is even asserted that that river was celebrated by rishis in the Veda as well as in the Purana.<sup>14</sup> Iti śrutāḥ is similarly used in this latter way.<sup>15</sup>

The use of śruti for ordinary tradition is thus well-established in the earlier parts of the Puranas and especially in those containing kṣatriya tradition. When there was need to distinguish Vedic tradition, it was cited as Vaidikī śruti; <sup>1</sup> and so also Vedic gāthās <sup>2</sup> and Vedic mantras <sup>3</sup> were distinguished from ordinary gāthās and Puranic mantras by the same epithet. Sometimes the word lankika was added to distinguish ordinary or popular matters from Vedic, as in the cases of dharma, <sup>4</sup> vidyā <sup>5</sup> and śabda. <sup>6</sup>

The phrase iti śrūtāḥ is common. <sup>7</sup> The words śrūyate <sup>8</sup> and śrūyante <sup>9</sup> are used of tradition. This use of śrūyate is set against śrūyate in brahmanical works; thus, it is often used in the Vedārthadīpikā and always of statements quoted from Vedic literature, but never, I believe, of non-sacred tradition, which is cited simply as an 'itihāsa', or by the word smarayate in its notice of Rig-veda i, 65.

The Vāyu, Brahmānda and Viṣṇu give an account, how the original Purana came into existence; <sup>10</sup> and the Bhāgavata also gives an account, <sup>11</sup> which however is different and, being late and untrustworthy, need not be noticed. Those three Puranas say—Kṛṣṇa Dvaipāyana divided the single Veda into four and arranged them, and so was called Vyāsa. He entrusted them to his four disciples, one to each, namely Paila, Vaiśampāyana, Jaimini and Sumantu. <sup>12</sup> Then with tales, anecdotes, songs and lore that had come down from the ages he compiled a Purana, <sup>13</sup> and taught it and the Itihāsa to his fifth disciple, the sūta Romaharṣaṇa or Lomaharṣaṇa. <sup>14</sup>

After that he composed the Mahābhārata.<sup>1</sup> The epic itself implies that the Purana preceded it. It says that Vyūsa, just after he had composed it, declared that he had already made the Itihāsas and Puranas manifest.<sup>2</sup> It also asserts that a Vaisnava may gain the same merit by listening to it that is gained by listening to the eighteen Puranas<sup>3</sup>—a statement which (however much we discount the number eighteen) would hardly have suggested itself, if the epic was believed to be prior to all the Puranas. The epic has also borrowed from the Puranas,<sup>4</sup> more often I think than they cite it.

This account mentions the materials<sup>5</sup> from which the Purana was compiled. As explained above, the sūtas had from remote times preserved the genealogies of gods, rishis and kings, and traditions and ballads about celebrated men, that is, exactly the material—tales, songs and ancient lore—out of which the Purana was constructed. Whether or not Vyāsa composed the original Purana or superintended its compilation, is immaterial for the present purpose. What is important is that there was abundant tradition of various kinds, which could and would naturally have been used in its construction, and of the very kinds that went to its construction. The ancient tales were topics of real interest to kings, people and rishis, as both the epics and the Puranas by their very structure proclaim, and they were also matters to which men of intelligence gave their attention.<sup>6</sup> Allusions in the Veda itself show the same.<sup>7</sup> It would be quite natural that, after the religious hymns were formed into the Veda, the ancient secular tales and lore should have been collected in a Purana.

What the next development of the Purana was is described in the Brahmānda and Vāyu, and similarly though less fully in the Viṣṇu.<sup>8</sup> Romaharsana made that Purāṇa-saṃhitā into six versions and taught them to his six disciples, Ātreyā Sumati, Kāśyapa Akṛtavraṇa, Bhāradvāja Agnivarcas, Vāsiṣṭha Mītrayu, Sāvarṇi Somadatti, and Suśarman Śāṁśapāyana. Three of them, Kāśyapa, Sāvarṇi and Śāṁśapāyana, made three separate saṁhitās, which were called by their names. Romaharṣaṇa's saṁhitā and those three were the 'root-compositions' (mūla-saṁhitā). They consisted of four divisions (pāda) and were to the same effect but differed in their diction. All except Śāṁśapāyana's contained 4,000 verses.

Those versions do not exist now;<sup>1</sup> still some of those persons, besides Romaharṣaṇa, appear as inquirers or narrators in some of the Puranas and also in the Mahābhārata.<sup>2</sup> Thus Sāvarṇi,<sup>3</sup> Kāśyapeya<sup>4</sup> and Śāṁśapāyana<sup>5</sup> appear in the Vāyu and Brahmāṇḍa, which are two of the oldest Puranas and were one originally. The passages in which those persons appear may be remnants of those old Puranas incorporated in these two, especially as Śāṁśapāyana not seldom appears without announcement. Moreover these two Puranas alone have the old fourfold division spoken of in the above passage,<sup>1</sup> and their four pādas are called Prakriyā, Anuṣāṅga, Upodghāta and Upasainhāra.<sup>2</sup> The others have either no divisions, as the Matsya<sup>3</sup> and Brahma, or have a different number with other terms than pāda, as the Viṣṇu and Padma, Kūrma and Harivamśa.

After the original Purana was composed, by Vyāsa as is said, his disciple Romaharṣaṇa taught it to his son Ugraśravas,<sup>4</sup> and Ugraśravas the sauti appears as the reciter in some of the present Puranas;<sup>5</sup> and the sūtas still retained the right to recite it for their livelihood.<sup>6</sup> But, as stated above, Romaharṣaṇa taught it to his six disciples, at least five of whom were brahmans. It thus passed into the hands of brahmans, and their appropriation and development of it increased in the course of time, as the Purana grew into many Puranas, as Sanskrit learning became peculiarly the province of the brahmans,<sup>7</sup> and as new and frankly sectarian Puranas were composed. How they dealt with these subjects is explained thus—‘Wise men, extracting valuable matters everywhere from the multitude of ancient stories (or the Puranas), have described things in many ways in various Puranas.’<sup>8</sup> This also acknowledges that the Puranas grew up in various localities.

This account of the origin of the Purana is supported by copious direct allusions to ancient tradition in the Puranas. These might be cited from many Puranas, but will be taken here chiefly from the Vāyu and Brahmānda, which have the oldest version in such traditional matters, and also from the Matsya, Brahma and Harivamśa, which have the next best versions.

There are many allusions to matters that were handed down from very ancient times, long before the original Purana was

That there were men whose business it was to know the ancient genealogies and tales is proved by various expressions often met with, for nothing less than this can be implied by the frequent references to them as authoritative exponents of ancient events and by the many terms used to describe them. Thus, first, as regards ancient tradition generally, we find the term purā-vid, designating those who sang an ancient genealogical verse about the famous Yādava king Saśabindu,<sup>6</sup> those who sang the songs of the pīṭṛs,<sup>7</sup> and others.<sup>8</sup> Its use was extended to later minstrels in additions made to the Puranas, and so the Vāyu in its description of the dynasties of the Kali age applies it to those who sang about the last Paurava king,<sup>9</sup> the Mahābhārata to those who sang about gifts,<sup>10</sup> and the late Bhāgavata to those who sang about Kṛṣṇa.<sup>11</sup>

Puranas)' and are found so used;<sup>1</sup> as also the precise expressions, Purāṇa-vettr,<sup>2</sup> Purāṇa-vācaka,<sup>3</sup> and others.<sup>4</sup> But at other times purāṇa-jñā, purāṇa-vil and paurāṇika imply more and can only mean 'one who knows the ancient tales'. Thus, as regards purāṇa-jñās, vāṁśa-vids are cited as quoting an old verse sung by purāṇa-jñās as older authorities about Māndhāṭṛ;<sup>5</sup> paurāṇikas are cited as quoting an old verse sung by purāṇa-jñās about Datta Ātreya;<sup>6</sup> and a verse about king Devāvṛḍha is repeated as well known from a genealogy recited by purāṇa-jñās.<sup>7</sup> This term is applied even to maharṣis,<sup>8</sup> when it cannot reasonably mean merely 'knowing the Purana'.<sup>9</sup> Similarly purāṇa-vil janas are quoted as singing a song about Rāma Dūśarathi of Ayodhyā,<sup>10</sup> about king Rantideva,<sup>11</sup> and about king Vyusitāsva of Ayodhyā,<sup>12</sup> and others.<sup>13</sup> Paurāṇika generally refers to the Puranas and means 'one who knows the Puranas',<sup>14</sup> yet it appears sometimes to mean 'those who know the purāṇas or ancient stories',<sup>15</sup> as in the old ksatriya ballad about king Satyavrata Triśaṅku, in which the Vāyu and Brahmāṇḍa quote verses more ancient than themselves as having been recited by paurāṇika janas.<sup>16</sup>

word purātana is used, denoting sometimes men not really ancient, such as the brāhmans who treated of the dynasties of the Kali age<sup>1</sup> not earlier than about the sixth century B.C., but sometimes men more ancient as those who sang about Saśabindu<sup>2</sup> and Alarka.<sup>3</sup>

The way in which these terms are introduced shows that they do not refer to the present Puranas and hardly even to the original Purana, but more probably to ancient minstrels, because no songs could have been handed down unless there had been a succession of minstrels, as is natural; and the verses that are quoted are scraps of song, evidently the remains of larger ballads, for there are always pieces of ancient poetry surviving.

Next, as regards genealogical lore, expressions are used, which prove that genealogies were specially studied, just as the Veda and other subjects were studied. Thus vaiṁśa-vid<sup>4</sup> occurs, denoting 'one who had acquired knowledge of genealogies', just as plainly as Veda-vid<sup>5</sup> meant 'one who had learnt the Veda', and Vedānta-vid,<sup>6</sup> yoga-vid,<sup>7</sup> and even sāṅkhyā-vid,<sup>8</sup> besides many similar expressions which imply thorough knowledge.<sup>9</sup> Vaiṁśa-vids are mentioned as quoting from more ancient purāṇa-jñas (p. 26), and in particular Soma-vaiṁśa-vids<sup>10</sup> are referred to. The character of these men is emphasized by the superlative vaiṁśa-vittama,<sup>11</sup> showing that there were men specially learned in genealogies, just as Veda-vittamas<sup>12</sup> are alluded to; and these special genealogists were ancient and are cited as earlier authorities by paurūṇikas.<sup>13</sup>

The same fact is proved by the word cintaka, which in vaiśa-cintaka<sup>1</sup> proves that men did give thought to ancient genealogies, just as it shows in Veda-cintaka<sup>2</sup> that men gave thought to the Veda, as is well known. Similarly are used the terms vaiśa-purāṇa-jñā<sup>3</sup> and anuvaiśa-purāṇa-jñā,<sup>4</sup> meaning either 'one who knew the genealogies and Purana', or better 'one who knew the ancient tales connected with the genealogies'. It thus appears that ancient genealogies and tales were matters of study as well as the Veda, but the brahmans, with the growing pretensions of their caste and doctrines, and through the political vicissitudes that befell North India, exalted the Vedic literature to the undue depreciation of non-religious lore.

In this connexion two expressions may be noticed, which occur rarely, yet seem to indicate that genealogies were not accepted blindly but were scrutinized in order to ascertain the true or most trustworthy version. One is icchanti, which appears to mean 'men prefer', 'men approve', as if the statement to which it is applied was approved after inquiry;<sup>5</sup> and it is used somewhat similarly elsewhere.<sup>6</sup> The other is śamsanti, which does not mean 'extol' in the passages where it occurs, because Antara (Uttara, Uttama) is unknown otherwise, but it appears to mean 'men announce', in an emphatic way as if settling some difference of opinion.<sup>7</sup>

The genealogists and students of ancient tales are often mentioned without any allusions to their status, and are sometimes called by the general word jana<sup>8</sup> added to the various appellations mentioned above; but at other times the description 'brahmans' (dvija,<sup>9</sup>

vipra<sup>1</sup> and even śrutarṣi<sup>2</sup> and maharṣi<sup>3</sup>) is applied to those who knew the old tales. They were sūtas in the most ancient times, though Court brahmans may have possessed such knowledge, for the Rāmāyaṇa makes Daśaratha's priest Vasiṣṭha declare the royal genealogy of Ayodhyā twice,<sup>4</sup> while king Janaka himself sets out his own genealogy.<sup>5</sup>

But in later times, and certainly after the compilation of the Purana and its passing into the hands of Romaharṣaṇa's brahman disciples, the sūtas appear to have gradually lost this particular connexion with these matters, which became in time a speciality of certain brahmans, who thus developed into students and expounders of the Puranas. It is to this class that the description, noticed above, of Purāṇa-jñānas, Paurāṇikas, &c., refers when they are brahmans. By devoting themselves especially to the Puranas, they would naturally have tended to diverge from those who studied the Vedas and to form a separate class, for they would very rarely have been able to combine proficiency in both wide fields of literature. The difference between the two classes is noticed, for mention is made of the brahmans who knew the Puranas, as already cited, and brahmans who were wise in the Veda;<sup>6</sup> and Vedic literature itself discloses that the latter class knew little of Puranic tradition, as many an article in the Vedic Index shows when compared with information to be gathered from the Puranas. The priestly brahmans would have regarded the Purana-knowing brahmans as having fallen away from the highest brahmanic standard, and on the other hand the latter would naturally have magnified their own office and extolled the Puranas, and have enhanced both by incorporating distinctly brahmanic teaching and practice into the Puranas. Accordingly the Puranas, expressly or impliedly comparing themselves with the Vedas, claim superlative praise for themselves and assert the dignity of the brahmans who recited and expounded them.

There was in fact clear rivalry on the part of the Puranas with the Vedas. First as regards antiquity, Vyāsa is said to have arranged the Veda and formed the four Vedas, and the Puranas, putting aside the account of their origin given above, say he divided the one original Purana into the existing eighteen,<sup>1</sup> thus placing themselves in the same chronological rank with the Vedas. Further, the brahmans asserted that the Veda had existed from everlasting, and the Puranas, while acknowledging its primaevial antiquity, claimed for themselves even prior antiquity. Thus five at least declare that at the beginning of things Brahmā remembered the Purana first of all the scriptures before the Vedas issued from his mouths.<sup>2</sup>

Next, as regards their character, the Puranas place themselves on an equality with the Veda, for many of them assert that they are Veda-sammīta, or Vedaiḥ sammīta,<sup>3</sup> 'of equal measure with the Veda'; and even a single story is so estimated.<sup>4</sup> The title Veda is sometimes given to them,<sup>5</sup> and so the Vāyu (1, 18) calls itself Purāṇa-Veda. Śruti is applied to their tradition as shown above, and the word rc<sup>6</sup> and also apparently sūkta<sup>7</sup> to their verses. The brahmans extolled the Veda in the highest degree, yet the Puranas exalt themselves even more highly.<sup>8</sup> Consequently they distinguished themselves from smṛti.<sup>9</sup> The hymns of the Rigveda were 'seen' by rishis, but all the Puranas except two (the Nāradīya and Vāmana) declare that they were originally delivered by some god,<sup>10</sup> thus claiming a divine authorship, higher than that of rishis; and the Padma even asserts that it is Viṣṇu himself.<sup>11</sup>

Thirdly, as regards their teaching and authority, they claim divine sanction, and freely introduce gods as dramatis personae, who give instruction upon all kinds of subjects, thus placing their teaching beyond cavil.<sup>1</sup> Also the strongest censure is passed on those who regarded or treated the recital of the Purana disrespectfully.<sup>2</sup> In late additions the sūta Romaharṣaṇa is called a muni and extolled,<sup>3</sup> and even his son Raumaharṣaṇi is lauded fulsomely, and called jagad-guru.<sup>4</sup>

Fourthly, as regards their value and efficacy. The brahmans asserted a supreme position for the Veda, to dispute which was blasphemy, but the Puranas claimed even higher merit for themselves; thus, to give only a few instances, it is said the Purana destroys all sin;<sup>5</sup> it gives every blessing and even final emancipation from existence;<sup>6</sup> it bestows union with Brahmā;<sup>7</sup> it raises one to Viṣṇu;<sup>8</sup> that is, in short, the Puranas gave blessings equal, or rather superior, to anything the Vedas could give.<sup>9</sup> It is said that the Purana should be heard even by brahmans who attained the utmost bounds of sacred knowledge (brahma-para),<sup>10</sup> and that even tales in the Purana would make a brahman know the Veda.<sup>11</sup>

Further the brahmans arrogated to themselves the monopoly of revelation and religious ceremonies and ritual. The Puranas, while acknowledging their great privileges, yet inculcated much teaching that virtually superseded brahmanic doctrine in extolling the superlative efficacy of tīrthas,<sup>1</sup> religious devotion (yoga),<sup>2</sup> exercises (vrata),<sup>3</sup> and loving faith (bhakti),<sup>4</sup> whereby a man can obtain every blessing, remission of every sin and final emancipation from existence.<sup>5</sup> The Padma goes so far as to say, 'enough of vratas, tīrthas, yogas, sacrifices and discourses about knowledge, faith (bhakti) alone indeed bestows final emancipation.'<sup>6</sup> Some Puranas do not hesitate to introduce the sacred gāyatrī into a spell,<sup>7</sup> and even to modify and almost parody it.<sup>8</sup>

Lastly as regards the dignity of the brahmans who recited or expounded the Puranas, the Vāyu, Padma and Śiva assert that a brahman was not really wise if he did not know the Purana (p. 1),<sup>9</sup> thus making knowledge of the Purana the crown of all learning; and the laudation is carried farthest in the Padma, which gives directions about reciting the Purana and has much to say about the brahman who knew and expounded the Puranas,<sup>10</sup> proclaiming that—the brahman who declares the Puranas is superior (visiṣyate) to every one; even sin committed by him cannot adhere to him; the Purana destroys the sins of every one else; and if a believer in the Puranas esteems the declarer of them as a guru who gives knowledge of sacred science (brahma-vidyā), all his sins disappear.<sup>11</sup> The Matsya imprecates a curse on those who reviled the Purāṇajñānas.<sup>12</sup> Those who recited the Purana were worthy of signal honour,<sup>13</sup> but various faults disqualified them.<sup>14</sup>

CHAPTER III

CONTENTS OF THE EARLIEST PURANAS

It has been explained in the last chapter how the original Puran was compiled. The materials used were ākhyānas, upākhyānas, gāihās and kalpa-jōktis (and the equivalent kalpa-vākyas). Similar materials would appear to have gone to make up the Itihāsa.

The term kalpa in a precise sense means a vast cosmic period, but this seems to have been a later application of it, when the scheme of cosmological time was developed. It is not seldom used in a simpler and unspecialized way to mean 'a period of time', 'an age', and this seems to have been its earlier signification, as where it is said, wise men knew the old tales of the old time.<sup>9</sup> In this way kalpa is often used loosely;<sup>10</sup> and so also purā-kalpa,<sup>11</sup> as where it is declared that purā-kalpa-vids knew a particular vrata,<sup>12</sup> and proclaim songs sung by king Ambarīṣa.<sup>1</sup> Accordingly kalpa must have this general sense when it is used in the above words kalpa-jókti and kalpa-vākyā.

Purāna and itihāsa, apart from their application to compilations, are applied to single stories.<sup>2</sup> Purāna means any 'old tale', or 'ancient lore' generally,<sup>3</sup> and itihāsa would seem properly to denote a story of fact in accordance with its derivation iti ha ḫāsa, which rather denotes actual traditional history.<sup>4</sup> But the line between fact and fable was hardly definite and gradually became blurred, especially where the historical sense was lacking, and so no clear distinction was made, particularly in brahmanic additions to the Puranas. Hence both words tended to become indefinite. The Vedārthadīpikā calls all the old stories it cites itihāsas, and never uses the word Purāṇa, I believe, except once, and then of a quotation from 'the Puranas', which agrees with the Mahābhārata.<sup>5</sup> Purana is applied to a single story, whether quasi-historical<sup>6</sup> or mythological<sup>7</sup> or instructive;<sup>8</sup> and so also an itihāsa may be an ordinary tale<sup>9</sup> or quasi-historical,<sup>10</sup> fanciful,<sup>11</sup> mythological<sup>12</sup> or even didactic.<sup>13</sup> In later additions to the Puranas any kind of tale is called an itihāsa, and spurious antiquity was ascribed to stories, fables, and other matters that are manifestly late by adding the epithet purātana.<sup>1</sup> Moreover no strong distinction was made in later times between these terms and ākhyāna, and they are not seldom treated as synonymous.<sup>2</sup>

As collective terms Itihāsa and Purāna are often mentioned as distinct,<sup>3</sup> and yet are sometimes treated as much the same; thus the Vāyu calls itself both a Purana and an Itihāsa,<sup>4</sup> and so also the Brahmānda.<sup>5</sup> The Brahma calls itself a Purana and an Ākhyāna.<sup>6</sup> The Mahābhārata calls itself by all these terms.<sup>7</sup>

The word Purana occurs often in the singular. In various passages it means the Puranas collectively,<sup>8</sup> and in some places it is doubtful whether the singular or plural is intended,<sup>9</sup> but in others<sup>10</sup> it means 'the Purana' and refers apparently to the original Purana, and this seems specially clear where its locative is used in connexion with ancient tenets.<sup>11</sup>

The Purana as so framed was entrusted to the sūta Romaharṣaṇa in virtue of the duties that appertained to sūtas (p. 21), and it is there said that the matters with which sūtas were concerned were displayed in itihāsas and purāṇas, itihāsa-purāneṣu distā. It makes no real difference whether we understand these words as meaning that those matters 'were displayed in tales and ancient stories' or as meaning that they 'are displayed in the Itihāsas and Puranas'; for in the former case those tales and ancient stories would have been comprised among the materials used, and the latter construction would say definitely that they had been incorporated in the Itihāsas and Puranas. It is clear then that the original Purana dealt with ancient traditions about gods, rishis and kings, their genealogies and famous deeds. Itihāsas appear to have remained distinct for some time, and Liṅga i, 26, 28 mentions the Śaiva as one; but afterwards they would seem to have become absorbed into the Puranas.<sup>1</sup>

Genealogies and the deeds of famous kings and rishis constituted two subjects. Traditions about gods and (to some extent) the most ancient rishis and kings would divide themselves into the three subjects of creation, its obvious end and dissolution, and the Manvantaras. The matters then with which the Purana would have dealt were these five subjects, and the truth of the old verse about the five subjects that every Purana should treat of becomes manifest, namely, original creation, dissolution and re-creation, the Manvantaras, ancient genealogies and accounts of persons mentioned in the genealogies.<sup>2</sup> These gave rise to the term pañca-lakṣaṇa, as a special epithet of the 'Purana'. This term manifestly could not have been coined after the Puranas substantially took their present composition, comprising great quantities of other matters, especially brahmanic doctrine and ritual, dharma of all kinds, and the merits of tīrthas, which are often expounded with emphatic prominence. It belongs to a time before these matters were incorporated into the Puranas. It is therefore ancient, characterizes the earliest Puranas, and shows what their contents were.

Dharma in all its branches bulks very large in the present Puranas, but is not alluded to nor even implied in any of those five subjects. Hence it was no ingredient of the earliest Puranas, except probably such simple lessons as might be conveyed incidentally in those five subjects.<sup>3</sup> It has been explained how the original Purana was soon developed into four separate versions (p. 23), and thenceforward the Puranic brahmans developed the Puranas. The multifarious other matters now found were thus later additions, such augmentations gradually nullified the ancient fivefold division, and it was then possible that Puranas could be composed which diverged from that character, pañca-lakṣaṇa. The Puranas naturally lent themselves to augmentation, and the Puranic brahmans used their opportunities to the full, partly with further genuine traditions, but mostly with additions of brahmanic stories and fables and doctrinal and ritual matter.

The Matsya implies this, for, after describing the eighteen Puranas and the characteristic subjects of a Purana (53, 10-59), it adds (66-9) that the five-subject Purana treats also of the māhātmya of Brahmā, Viṣṇu, the sun, Rudra and the earth; and that dharma, wealth, love and final emancipation from existence and what is repugnant thereto are treated of in all the Puranas. The Vāyu, which states the five characteristic subjects, describes the eighteen Puranas briefly (104, 2-11), and adds (11-17), that they give instruction about many dharmas belonging to all classes and āśramas, about rivers, sacrifices, austerities and gifts, about yoga, faith, and knowledge, about the cults of Brahmā, Śiva, Viṣṇu, the sun, the saktis and the Ārhatas<sup>1</sup> and many other matters. Some of these matters, if not most, were certainly not ancient, and very few of them could by any stretch of terms be reckoned within the five characteristic subjects. Hence clearly all these matters were later additions, additions manifestly made by the Puranic brahmans.

The compilation of the original Purana and even of the four versions into which it developed does not mean that all the traditions existing at that time were collected therein, and in fact it would have been impossible to condense them all into the 4,000 verses of which those collections consisted. There must have been much other tradition surviving about ancient times; just as there were traditions about later kings (which were not admitted into the Puranas because they belonged to later times), as indeed Kālidāsa testifies when he alludes to old villagers who were well acquainted with the stories about king Udayana.<sup>2</sup> Such outstanding traditions about ancient times were no doubt taken up and incorporated and so contributed to the augmentation of the Puranas. As specimens of such may probably be reckoned the story about Bhīṣma and

Ugrāyudha,<sup>1</sup> Sagara's campaign in west India,<sup>2</sup> the genealogy of a branch of kings descended from the Yadava Lomapāda,<sup>3</sup> which appear in single passages only. The Mahābhārata also incorporated many such traditions, which are introduced as extraneous vehicles of instruction ; such as the stories of Lopāmudrā and Agastya,<sup>4</sup> of Marutta and Saṁvarta,<sup>5</sup> and of Nala.<sup>6</sup>

As regards traditional history there is generally little evidence to show whether particular stories about kings were in the original compilation, yet the character of certain tales suggests that they were there, such as (1) the natural and simple accounts of kings Satyavrata-Triśaṅku<sup>7</sup> and Sagara<sup>8</sup> narrated in the Ayodhyā genealogy, and (2) the frequent narration of and allusions to other tales in a historical setting, such as the legend of Purūravas and his queen Urvaśi,<sup>9</sup> and that of the rishi Cyavana and his princess-wife Sukanya.<sup>10</sup> For instance, Purūravas and Urvaśi were according to tradition the progenitors of the great Aila race ; hence their legend must have existed in the earliest times, and it is noteworthy that Śāyaṇa mentions it as a typical purāṇa.<sup>11</sup> It is found in the present Puranas. Obviously their legend must have existed through all the intervening ages, because, when oral tradition is the only means of perpetuation, things once forgotten are lost for ever. The fact that Purūravas and Urvaśi are mentioned in a hymn of the Rigveda (x, 95) would not account for the legend that exists, because other persons who are far more prominent in the Veda are unknown to general tradition, as for instance, Vadhryaśva, Divodāsa and Sudās (p. 7). It is true that stories were fabricated in later times about ancient kings and rishis, but such stories betray their character in various ways that will be noticed in chapter V, and stand on a different footing. That hymn by itself is obscure, but was intelligible to those who knew the legend,<sup>1</sup> and therefore implies the existence of the legend when it was composed.<sup>2</sup>

The first three subjects that Puranas should treat of are based on imagination, are wholly fanciful, and do not admit of any practical examination; hence it would be a vain pursuit to investigate them here. The fourth and fifth subjects however, genealogies and tales of ancient kings, profess to be historical tradition and do admit of chronological scrutiny; hence they are well worth considering. It is manifest from the Rigvedic hymns that there was real civilization in India, there were independent kings, and famous exploits were celebrated in song. Independent kings imply separate dynasties. Dynasties had genealogies, hence there were genealogies to be incorporated in the original Purana. The genealogies will be dealt with in chapters VIII and IX. Here may be noticed the fifth subject, and there is plenty of tradition to testify who were the ancient kings renowned for their deeds.

The greatest kings were generally styled cakravartins,<sup>3</sup> sovereigns who conquered surrounding kingdoms or brought them under their authority, and established a paramount position over more or less extensive regions around their own kingdoms. There is a list of sixteen celebrated monarchs and their doings, which is called the Sodasa-rājika, and is given twice.<sup>4</sup> They are these:—

Marutta Āvikṣita	Māndhāṭṛ Yauvanāśva
Suhotra Ātithina	Yayāti Nāhuṣa
Bṛhadhratha Vira <sup>5</sup> the Āṅga	Ambariṣa Nābhāgi
Sivi Auśinara	Śāśabindu Caitraratha
Bharata Dausyanti	Gaya Āmūrtarayasa
Rāma Dāśarathi	Rantideva Sāṅkṛti
Bhagīratha	Sagara Aikṣvāku
Dilipa Ailavila Khaṭvāṅga	Pr̥thu Vainya.

dagnya; but he does not properly fall into this enumeration because he was not a king. Suhotra Ātithina is Suhotra, the descendant of Vitatha,<sup>1</sup> Bharata's successor, Ātithina being a variant of Vaitathina. All these were eminent kings and all will be found in the genealogies<sup>2</sup> except Pṛthu Vainya, whose lineage stands quite apart from the other genealogies and seems rather mythical.<sup>3</sup> The list does not arrange the kings in any proper order. Māndhāṭṛ, Sagara, Bhagiratha, Ambarīṣa,<sup>4</sup> Dilīpa (Dilīpa II) and Rāma Dāśarathi belonged to the Ayodhyā dynasty; and Marutta to the Vaiśala dynasty. Yayāti was of the Aila race; and among his descendants were Bharata, Suhotra, Rantideva and Brhadratha in the Paurava line, and Śaśabindu a Yādava and Śivi an Ānava. There were two kings named Gaya Āmūrtarayasa (son of Amūrtarayas), one who reigned at Gayā,<sup>5</sup> and the other on the river Payoṣṇī<sup>6</sup> (the modern Taptī); the former seems to be meant here.

Another list<sup>7</sup> names certain kings who gained the title saṃrāj,<sup>8</sup> 'paramount sovereign', four of the foregoing, Yauvanāśva (Māndhāṭṛ),<sup>9</sup>

Other lists are found,<sup>6</sup> but it is unnecessary to quote more. They contain most of the foregoing names and new names also, but the compilers were no experts, for the names are generally jumbled together without dynastic, genealogical or chronological order. A very few lists do aim at chronological order, and the longest is one that describes the descent of the sword of justice,<sup>7</sup> thus—Manu, Kṣupa, Ikṣvāku, Purūravas, Āyus, Nahuṣa, Yayāti, Pūru, &c.; but the order after Pūru is worthless, thus it places Ailavila (Dilipa II) before Dhundhumāra, Mucukunda and Yuvanāśva, though he was long posterior to them in the Ayodhyā line. This list is in the Śānti-parvan and is a brahmanical compilation with the usual brahmanical lack of the historical sense, yet it shows who were remembered as righteous rulers even by brahmans.

These lists have been set out, in order that there should be no lack of names of notable kings for comparison. They show that the really famous kings occur repeatedly and were well established in tradition; and that there were many others less celebrated but yet well known. It is very remarkable, as pointed out before (p. 7), how widely these kings differ from those extolled in the Rigveda and Vedic literature, even when the lists are brahmanical. Rigvedic kings are practically non-existent here, and eulogies of kings in all that literature hardly count in the compilation of these lists. This fact shows how entirely apart from general popular thought stood Vedic literature in this matter. The popular scale of values was totally different from that of Vedic brahmans. Hence it is clear how little Vedic brahmans were in touch with public life and interests,<sup>1</sup> and of what small importance Vedic literature is as regards historical matters.

These divergencies and also the fact that the Puranas sometimes contain statements that differ from those in brahmanic literature show that the Puranic stream of tradition flowed independently of the Vedic stream. The former sometimes incorporated brahmanical doctrines and tales, and Vedic literature sometimes borrowed from Puranic and Itihāsic sources.<sup>2</sup> The divergence however is substantial and shows that the Puranic brahmans must have received the different account when they took over the Puranas, and that they preserved it, notwithstanding the disagreements, as being genuine tradition.

Now may be noticed the matters that Āpastamba<sup>3</sup> quotes from Puranas, viz., three doctrines from a Purana, and one from the Bhaviṣyat Purana, as bearing on the contents of the Puranas in his time.

The first passage is translated thus by Bühler<sup>4</sup>—“Now they quote also in a Purāṇa the following two verses: “The Lord of creatures has declared, that food offered unasked and brought by the giver himself, may be eaten, though (the giver be) a sinner, provided the gift has not been announced beforehand. The manes of the ancestors of that man who spurns such food, do not eat (his oblations) for fifteen years, nor does the fire carry his offerings (to the gods)”. These verses occur in Manu iv, 248–9, as Bühler notes, with some variations. I have not so far found them in any Purana, but they are probably somewhere there.

apparently Āpastamba has not quoted literally but has summarized the dictum of the Purana. His citation is fully supported by the Matsya, which says<sup>1</sup>—‘One may indeed unhesitatingly smite (or kill) a guru or a boy or an old man or a brahman very learned in the Vedas, who advances as an ātatāyin against one: the smiter (or killer) incurs no guilt whatever in killing an ātatāyin; (it is,) wrath meets that wrath’. The agreement in phraseology shows that this is evidently the passage that Āpastamba had in mind. The Padma has a similar passage about the ātatāyin, though differently expressed.<sup>2</sup>

Ātatāyin meant originally ‘having one’s bow drawn (ready for shooting)’ and so ‘prepared to take another’s life’. Then it was applied to cases of murderous assault as in the Matsya and Padma passages, which lay down that it was no offence to kill an ātatāyin outright. This was evidently a maxim of popular justice, because Āpastamba cites as his authority, not a law-book, but a Purana. His phraseology shows he was quoting the doctrine as expressed in the Matsya, and Manu afterwards copied the very words of that version (viii, 350–1). Ātatāyin was afterwards extended in its scope and applied as a legal term to include other heinous offenders, such as incendiaries, poisoners, robbers, &c., and is so defined in those two Puranas,<sup>3</sup> and similarly in law-books.<sup>4</sup> The word thus came to include one who was actuated by injurious or malign intent,<sup>5</sup> and Āpastamba’s expression himsārtham, ‘in order to injure’, rather suggests that it had acquired its wider meaning before his time.<sup>6</sup>

The third passage<sup>7</sup> is translated thus by Bühler<sup>8</sup>—‘Now they quote (the following) two verses from a Purāna: Those eighty thousand sages who desired offspring passed to the south by Aryaman’s road and obtained burial-grounds. Those eighty thousand sages who desired no offspring passed by Aryaman’s road to the north and obtained immortality’. I have not found the precise verses cited by him in any Purana, but the same statements expressed in very similar language are found in the Vāyu, Brahmānda, Matsya and Viṣṇu, with fuller descriptions.<sup>1</sup> Āpastamba quotes a conciser version.

The passage<sup>2</sup> which cites the Bhavisyat Purana runs thus, as translated by Bühler<sup>3</sup>—“These (sons) who live, fulfilling the rites taught (in the Veda), increase the fame and heavenly bliss of their departed ancestors. In this manner each succeeding (generation increases the fame and heavenly bliss) of the preceding ones. They (the ancestors) live in heaven until the (next) general destruction of created things. (After the destruction of the world, they stay) again in heaven, being the seed (of the new creation)”. That has been declared in the Bhavishyatpurāna’. This is expressed in concise prose, and it is clear that Āpastamba has summarized herein the doctrine of the Bhavisyat Purana, and has even severely condensed it. He does not name the ancestors as pitr̄s, but it is obvious that he has ranked them as Pitr̄s, as of course they are.

The present Bhavisya appears to be the modern presentation of the ancient Bhavisyat. There is nothing in the difference of name. The Matsya says (53, 31-2) that the Bhavisya specially extols the sun and concerns itself chiefly with ‘future’ events or events in ‘the future’;<sup>4</sup> and again, in describing the Sāmba (or Śāmba) Upapurana, it appears to say that the story of Sāmba or Śāmba (the name is written both ways) is the first part of the Bhavisyat and constitutes the whole of that Upapurana.<sup>5</sup> The present Bhavisya, after a preface (manifestly an addition) expounding dharma, worship of various kinds and other matters, extols and inculcates the majesty of the sun (i, 48 f.), and in connexion therewith tells the story of Kṛṣṇa’s son Sāmba.<sup>6</sup> The Varāha (177, 34, 51) says the Bhavisyat Purana deals with Sāmba. Thus the two names Bhavisya and Bhavisyat are given to the present Purana,<sup>7</sup> and there is no difference in name between the ancient Purana and the present one. There is no definite statement what the ancient Bhavisyat contained, yet its general purport was expressed in its name, as will be noticed in the next chapter. It is highly improbable that the present Bhavisya can be a totally different work from the ancient Bhavisyat. It was easier and more natural to tamper with and revise an existing work of acknowledged importance so as to bring it into accordance with later notions than to compose a wholly new work and supersede the earlier authority completely: and it is notorious that the Bhavisya<sup>1</sup> has been unblushingly tampered with, as evidenced by its historical account of the Kali age.

But whether the existing Bhavisya is the ancient Bhavisyat or not is not a question of any consequence in the matter under consideration. It says very little about cosmogony and the ages, and that little is clearly the presentation of later ideas. It is practically worthless as regards all ancient beliefs. To expect to find in it the doctrine that Āpastamba quoted from the Bhavisyat is futile, because that became obsolete. If we wish to discover that doctrine in the Puranas, we must look at those which have best preserved the ancient ideas about the Pitṛs, and there we do find it. The fullest account is in the Vāyu<sup>2</sup> and Brahmānda,<sup>3</sup> which are practically identical. The Harivaiśa<sup>4</sup> agrees closely therewith, so far as its shorter version goes; and a similar but brief account is given in the Matsya<sup>5</sup> and Padma,<sup>6</sup> which are almost alike. Similar accounts are found elsewhere.<sup>7</sup>

These texts say this.<sup>8</sup> There were various classes of Pitṛs, of different origins, forms, grades and abodes. One broad distinction is into Pitṛs who were divine and Pitṛs who were deceased men.<sup>9</sup>

Also some dwelt in heaven and some in the underworld.<sup>1</sup> The former who dwelt in heaven were as gods,<sup>2</sup> and they and the gods were reciprocally gods and pitṛs.<sup>3</sup> They were the most primeval deities,<sup>4</sup> and were indeed from everlasting,<sup>5</sup> and never cease to exist.<sup>6</sup> But the Pitṛs who were human ancestors (comprising the father, grandfather and great grandfather<sup>7</sup>) attained to and became one with the divine Pitṛs through righteousness<sup>8</sup> and dwelt blissfully in heaven with them.<sup>9</sup> At the end of every thousand yugas they are reborn,<sup>10</sup> they revive the worlds, and from them are produced all the Manus and all progeny at the new creations.<sup>11</sup>

These Puranas thus declare that the manusya pitṛs attain to the same condition and position as the divine Pitṛs, dwell in heaven and reproduce the world in the next creation—that is, they are the ‘seed’ which generates fresh life in the next creation.<sup>12</sup> Such is precisely the doctrine which Āpastamba quotes from the Bhavisyat. This is corroborated by certain further statements. The Pitṛs are classed with the gods, seven rishis and Manus, and all these are declared to be the sūdhakas of each new manvantara.<sup>1</sup> Moreover the Pitṛs were a comprehensive body of beings, for the seven chief r̥ṣiganas are also called Pitṛs;<sup>2</sup> and the restoration of humankind at the beginning of a new age is assigned to the seven rishis also,<sup>3</sup> and they are referred to in this function by the words santaty-arthā and santānārtha,<sup>4</sup> and santāna-kara,<sup>5</sup> which are synonymous with the word bijārtha that Āpastamba uses. The word bijārtha itself occurs in similar connexions, namely, in the restoration of population in the Kṛta age after this Kali age. Thus it is applied to Devāpi the Paurava and Maru<sup>6</sup> the Aikṣvāku, who will revive the brahma-kṣatras then;<sup>7</sup> and also to the renewal of the castes then.<sup>8</sup> The word thus has precisely the meaning which Āpastamba gives it, and his application of it to the Pitṛs sums up correctly the function assigned them as shown above.

These Puranas also declare that they repeat the doctrine concerning the Pitṛs, which was expounded in 'a Purana' or more probably in 'the Purana',<sup>9</sup> so that it was the ancient belief. 'The Purana' would obviously mean the original Purana. 'A Purana' might very appropriately mean the Bhavisyat, because the Bhavisyat would naturally treat of such future matters. From whatever Purana then they quoted this doctrine, they manifestly repeat the ancient belief that would have been expounded in the Bhavisyat in Āpastamba's time.

It has been pointed out above, that dharma was no ingredient of the earliest Puranas except probably such simple lessons as might be conveyed incidentally in the five special subjects of those Puranas; and these four doctrines cited by Āpastamba support that view. The third and fourth are not matters of dharma but of ancient cosmogony. The second is not dharma properly speaking, for it deals with criminal guilt and not sin, and merely declared a rule of common-sense jurisprudence. The first alone comes within the description of dharma. Only one then of the matters which Āpastamba quotes from Puranas belongs to dharma, and this fact is no proof that dharma was a subject dealt with in the earliest Puranas, because his book was concerned with dharma and he naturally cited only points of dharma.<sup>1</sup> The true inference therefrom would be that the Puranic brahmans had already begun to incorporate some dharma in the Puranas in his time.

CHAPTER IV

THE AGE OF THE ORIGINAL PURANA

THE age of the Puranas may now be considered according to the evidence obtained from themselves and from other sources. In doing this, the discussion must proceed from later known facts to earlier evidence.

The Vāyu Purana existed before A. D. 620, because it is referred to by Bāṇa in his Harṣa-carita,<sup>2</sup> and the writing in a MS. of the Skanda in the Royal Library of Nepal shows that that Purana also existed about that time.<sup>3</sup> Verses praising gifts of land are quoted in various land-grants, that are dated; and some of those are found only in the Padma, Bhaviṣya and Brahma Puranas, and thus indicate that those Puranas were in existence before A.D. 500 and even long before that time.<sup>4</sup> Some of those verses, which occur in grants of the years 475–6 and 482–3, are declared in some grants to have been enunciated by Vyāsa in the Mahābhārata.<sup>5</sup> They do

not however (as far as I know) occur there, but are found in the Padma and Bhavisya, and nowhere else. Such an error, citing the Mahābhārata instead of the Puranas, in a land-grant, which was not a learned treatise, is venial, especially as Vyāsa was believed to be the author of all those works. The mistake shows the pre-eminent position held by the epic then. The important point however is that the grantors assert that a book was the original authority for those verses; not popular lore nor unknown compositions. It follows therefore that either the Padma or the Bhavisya or both existed before A.D. 475 and even much earlier, and a similar conclusion, though not so clear, may be drawn as regards the Brahma.

Further the Matsya, Vāyu and Brahmānda say in their accounts of the dynasties of the Kali age that they borrowed their accounts from the Bhavisya;<sup>1</sup> and the internal evidence therein shows that the Bhavisya existed in the middle of the third century A.D., the Matsya borrowed before the end of that century, and the Vāyu and Brahmānda borrowed in the next century.<sup>2</sup> The present Bhavisya, as presented in the Śrī-Veṅkaṭeśvara edition, does not contain that account, but another altogether corrupt and false, and the reason is that the Bhavisya has been freely tampered with in order to bring its prophecies up to date and the ancient matter utterly vitiated: but those three Puranas show what it contained in the third century, as regards the dynasties of the Kali age.

Next may be considered the mention of the Bhavisyat Purana in the Āpastambīya Dharmasūtra (chap. III), and the inferences that may be drawn therefrom.

The 'Purana', as already pointed out, first came into existence as a collection of ancient legendary lore, and this, its original nature, is an essential fact. Āpastamba obviously refers in his citations of Puranas (chap. III) to definite books. Now the Bhavisyat Purana plainly professed by its title to treat of 'the future', and its title is a contradiction in terms. The first inference therefore is that such a name could not have been possible until the term Purana had become so thoroughly specialized as to have lost its proper meaning, and had become merely the designation of a particular class of books. It would have required the existence of a number of books called Puranas to produce that change, and manifestly they must have had their own special names to distinguish one from another, and so convert their common title Purana into a mere class designation.<sup>1</sup>

The next inference is that the foregoing change implied long usage—that is, the Puranas began long before Āpastamba's time. His sūtra is estimated by Bühler as not later than the third century B.C., and possibly 150–200 years earlier.<sup>2</sup> His citation of the Bhaviśyat as an authority shows that it was no new work then, but had acquired an acknowledged position of dignity, which it could not have attained to in less than half a century. Hence the Bhaviśyat cannot be placed later than the early part of the third century B.C., and even possibly earlier still by the above 150–200 years. At that time the title Purana had completely lost its original meaning, and the question arises, what length of time would have been required to bring about that result. There can be no definite pronouncement on this, but the time cannot have been less than two centuries, considering the conditions of literature in those times, and was probably much longer. Hence Puranas must have existed at least as early as the beginning of the fifth century B.C.; and this lower limit would be shifted 150–200 years earlier if a prior date be given to Āpastamba. It is quite probable therefore that the Matsya existed long prior to him, as indeed his citation of it indicates (p. 44).

The third inference from the name Bhaviśyat is that before that Purana could have been composed about 'the future' there must have been some general consensus of opinion when 'the future' began. The Bhaviśyat and Bhaviśya are referred to here as distinct, the former being the Purana cited by Āpastamba, and the latter that which existed in the third century A.D. as mentioned above, and which, modified by the continual tampering to which it has notoriously been subjected, we have now. When the Bhaviśyat was composed, whenever that was, obviously everything after that time was 'future', so that the third century B.C. at the latest and all after time fell into 'the future'; and it would have included the two preceding centuries if Āpastamba should be antedated. It is however pretty obvious that 'the future' must have commenced before the Bhaviśyat was composed, otherwise there would have been little to speak of beyond vague prophecies and teleology, subjects hardly attractive enough of themselves alone to win general interest in a new 'Purana'.<sup>1</sup> Hence 'the future' had probably been reckoned as having begun some time before, so that the author could have commenced with interesting tales of what had taken place before launching out into talk about the real and unknown future. This inference is entirely supported by the statement ante that the Bhaviṣyat began with the story of Kṛṣṇa's son Śāmba soon after the Bhārata battle, and by the following further declarations.

There is some definite information concerning, first, what was ranked as 'past', and secondly, what was considered to be 'future'. First, all the epic and Puranic traditions that deal with kings and princes, and less markedly with rishis, stop short soon after the great Bhārata battle. Till that event they are fairly copious, and after that they take in the reign of Yudhiṣṭhīra and his brothers, and, in the early and final chapters of the Mahābhārata, speak of their successors Parīkṣit II and Janamejaya III; <sup>2</sup> but there are no traditions about Janamejaya's successors, nor about any of the kings of the great dynasties of Ayodhyā and Magadha after that battle beyond a few curt allusions in the list of the kings of the Kali age.<sup>3</sup> 'The past' therefore was to that extent regarded as ending with the decease of the Pāṇḍavas, or later with Janamejaya III.

As regards 'the future' there are these data. The Vāyu professes to have been narrated in the reign of Asīmakṛṣṇa or Adhisīmakṛṣṇa, the great grandson of that Janamejaya and the sixth in generation from Arjuna, in the Paurava line.<sup>4</sup> The Matsya (50, 66) takes the same standpoint. Both definitely declare his successors to be future.<sup>5</sup> Both treat Divākara, king of Ayodhyā, and Senājit, king of Magadha, as reigning contemporaneously with him, and say they were respectively the fifth and seventh in succession from Brhdbala and Sahadeva who were killed in the great battle. Both declare their successors to be future, and so also does the Vāyu's counterpart, the Brahmānda.<sup>1</sup> These three Puranas thus start the 'future' kings in those three great dynasties with the sixth or seventh successors of those who took part in that battle; that is, they make 'the future' begin some five or six clear reigns after that battle, or about a century after it, if we put aside the extravagant lengths given to the reigns of Senājit's predecessors in Magadha.<sup>2</sup> This point is more definitely discussed in chapter XV.

The Viṣṇu and Bhāgavata in their accounts speak of Parīkṣit as reigning and his successors as future in the Paurava line,<sup>3</sup> but treat the first kings of Ayodhyā and Magadha after that battle, who were his contemporaries, as future.<sup>4</sup> These two Puranas thus make 'the future' begin some thirty years after the battle as regards Parīkṣit, but immediately after the battle as regards the two other dynasties. The Garuḍa speaks of Janamejaya as reigning in the Paurava line and his successors as future, but apparently treats 'the future' in the two other dynasties as beginning after that battle.<sup>5</sup>

As regards 'the future', then, these statements offer two limits of commencement, an upper, the end of the Bhārata battle, and a lower, about a century later.<sup>6</sup> Everything prior to the former was 'past', everything posterior to the latter was reckoned as definitely 'future', and the interval between them was intermediate, regarded sometimes as 'past' and sometimes as 'future'. The Matsya, Vāyu and Brahmānda contain the undoubtedly oldest account of the kings of the Kali age and assert the lower limit. The Bhavisyat and Bhaviṣya, by including the story of Kṛṣṇa's son Sāmba, took the earlier limit. The Viṣṇu, Garuḍa and Bhāgavata, which were later than the Bhavisyat, practically adopted its view. Āpastamba's citation of the Bhavisyat is perfectly compatible with either reckoning, for it merely indicates that 'the future' had already begun before the third century B.C.

The reckoning then was this. 'The past' ended and 'the future' began at the close of the Bhārata battle, or at the latest about a century afterwards.<sup>1</sup> The difference is not material for the present purpose. The transition manifestly implies a definite stage in the position of tradition, and indicates that previous tradition must have been collected then and formed into a definite compilation, which closed 'the past'. That would have been the precise consequence of the formation of the original Purana. Tradition says that the original Purana was composed about that time (p. 21).<sup>2</sup> The two therefore agree and the former corroborates the latter. True Puranas multiplied, the Bhavisyat was devised, and the Puranic brahmans had ample time to begin incorporating brahmanic matter, before Āpastamba's date.

These conclusions are corroborated by certain statements in the Kauṭilya Arthaśāstra, which may next be considered. It belongs to the fourth century B.C., about a century earlier than the latest date for Āpastamba.

Kauṭilya says, 'The three Vedas, the Sāman, R̥c and Yajus, are the threefold (scripture). The Atharva-veda and the Itihāsa-veda are also Vedas'.<sup>3</sup> He calls the Itihāsa a Veda and puts it on the same footing as the Atharva-veda. Clearly therefore the Itihāsa was something as definite and well known as that Veda. He also defines the Itihāsa thus—'Itihāsa means the Purāṇa, Itivṛtta (history), Ākhyāyikā (tale), Udāharāṇa (illustrative story), the Dharmasāstra and the Arthaśāstra'.<sup>4</sup> All these terms are obviously generic,<sup>5</sup> and Purana here means Puranas. As the Itihāsa was a Veda and definite, its component parts cannot have been indefinite, hence the Puranas were not an indefinite collection of ancient tales but must have been compositions certain and well established in character then. This is corroborated by another passage which says that a minister skilled in the Arthaśāstra should admonish a king, who is led astray, by means of the Itivṛtta and Purāṇa.<sup>6</sup> Here also the terms are generic, and the serious purpose for which the Puranas were to be used shows that they were not mere ancient tales but were definite and instructive compositions.

Kautilya enjoins that a prince should spend the afternoon in listening to the Itihāsa;<sup>1</sup> and in order to hear the Puranas the prince would need some one to recite them. Hence among the officials whom a king should retain with salaries are mentioned 'the Paurāṇika, the sūta and the māgadha'.<sup>2</sup> The Paurāṇika here is manifestly one specially conversant with the Puranas; and he is distinguished from the sūta and māgadha. He is also referred to in another passage in a similar setting, apart from them,<sup>3</sup> and separate. Kautilya uses the word Paurāṇika also to distinguish the Puranic sūta and māgadha from the two castes of mixed origin who were so named, but the former had ceased to exist then (p. 18). Hence the Puranas were old in his time. The three first mentioned, the Paurāṇika, the sūta and the māgadha, were quite different. Of these the latter two mean the mixed castes of sūtas and māgadhas who had succeeded to some at least of the functions of the ancient sūtas and māgadhas;<sup>4</sup> and the Paurāṇika was the person, whether brahman or other, who made the Puranas his speciality. His office proves that the Puranas were well known and established compositions in the fourth century B.C.; and the fact that the original sūta and māgadha were only known then from them shows also that the Puranas went back a considerable time before that century.

It thus appears from Kautilya that Puranas, definite works, existed at least as early as the fourth century B.C., possessed an authoritative position, and were not novel works then, but went back a long time previously as the Puranic sūta had completely disappeared.

The Purana was regarded with high respect even by the brahmins who upheld the Vedas specially. Thus the Atharva-veda says<sup>5</sup>—The ṛcs, and the sāmans, the metres, the Purāṇa, together with the Yajus, all gods in the heavens, founded upon heaven, were born of the ucciṣṭa. The Chāndogya Upaniṣad says<sup>6</sup>—The (hymns of the) Atharvāṅgiras are the bees, the Itihāsa-Purāṇa is the flower: and this simile, as expressed, implies that those hymns drew their sustenance from the Itihāsa and Purana, which must therefore have been ancient like those hymns. Both these passages imply that the Purana was something definite, like the other compositions mentioned, and was not a novel thing then.

Further the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa calls the Itihāsa-Purāṇa and certain other compositions 'honey-offerings to the gods', and commends their daily study.<sup>1</sup> It also appoints the Itihāsa and Purana for recitation by the priests, calling each a Veda.<sup>2</sup> These passages show that the Itihāsa and Purana were definite compositions. Similarly the Śāṅkhāyana Śrauta Sūtra and Āśvalāyana Sūtra<sup>3</sup> say—On the eighth day he tells the story which begins with Matsya Sāmmada . . . He then says, 'The Itihāsa-veda is the Veda, this is the Veda', and recites an Itihāsa. On the ninth day he tells the story which begins with Tārkṣya Vaipaśyata<sup>4</sup> . . . He then says, 'The Purāṇa-veda is the Veda, this is the Veda', and recites the Purāṇa.<sup>5</sup>

The story above mentioned that begins Matsyaḥ Sāmmadaḥ<sup>6</sup> appears to be that told in Viṣṇu iv, 2, 19 f. and Padma vi, 232, 33 f. about the rishi Saubhari. While practising long austerities he saw a fish named Sammada or Sāmamada joyous with an immense and happy family,<sup>7</sup> and aroused thereby, he married the fifty daughters of Māndhbāṭṛ, king of Ayodhyā, and maintained them in great magnificence and happiness.<sup>8</sup> That is probably what the above brahmanical passage cited. What is there called an itihāsa is found in two Puranas now. I have not found the story about Tārkṣya Vaipaśyata, but it was a story about birds.<sup>9</sup>

<sup>7</sup> Śatapatha Brāhm (xiii, 4, 3, 12) says, King Matsya Sāmmada and his people were water-dwellers. This cannot refer to the Matsya country and people, for their country was anything but watery; so matsya must mean 'fish'. Vedārth on Rigv viii, 67 says he was a fish.

As pointed out above (p. 54), a collection of tradition must have been made within a century or so after the Bhārata battle, thus closing the 'past' and its traditions, whence all subsequent occurrences belonged to the 'future'. This conclusion is confirmed by a general survey of tradition in the Puranas.

There is much traditional history including fairly copious genealogies down to the time of that battle and the death of Kṛṣṇa and the Pāṇḍavas, and then all the genealogies stop short except those of the three great kingdoms of Hastināpura, Ayodhyā and Magadha, although other old dynasties continued to exist, such as those of Pañcāla, Kāśī, Mithilā, &c.<sup>1</sup> There is a little historical tradition of the century or so that followed the battle, yet only concerning the first five Paurava kings in the first of those three kingdoms, and nothing about the two other kingdoms. After that century or so there is no historical tradition, and the genealogies of those three kingdoms are given in prophetic form, but were manifestly compiled long afterwards out of Prakrit chronicles.<sup>2</sup> Yet there were traditions about those 'future' kings, as, for instance, about the kings in Buddha's time and about king Udayana of Vatsa,<sup>3</sup> and none such are noticed in the Puranas, as far as I am aware. These facts, much traditional history down to the death of the Pāṇḍavas, a very little for a century or so following, and then none whatever in the Puranas, prove that there must have been a closing stage in tradition during that century or so—that is, that the original Purana must have been compiled about that time.

The absolute dearth of traditional history after that stage is quite intelligible, both because the compilation of the Purana had set a seal on tradition, and because the Purana soon passed into the hands of brahmans, who preserved what they had received, but with the brahmanic lack of the historical sense added nothing about later kings—just as the Bhāgavata Purana, which was composed about the ninth century A.D., added nothing to its account of the kings of the Kali age beyond where the Vāyu stopped some four centuries earlier. With the same lack however they have introduced in their own additions to the Puranas notices of brahmans who were later, such as Āsuri, Pañcasikha, &c.<sup>4</sup> This marked change at that stage betokens the compilation of the original Purana and the change in the custody of tradition from the sūtas to the brahmans. It is clear evidence that ancient traditions were collected while they were still well known, and while there was still a class of men whose business it was to preserve them carefully.

The Brāhmaṇas are in accord with this conclusion. The late Śatapatha has far more tradition than the earliest Brāhmaṇas. They were composed while the Purana or Puranas were in their infancy,<sup>1</sup> but it was composed after the Puranas had become established, and by quoting their tradition shows that they existed and that the recluse brahmans who studied the Vedas had at length become aware to some extent of the contents and importance of the Puranas.

CHAPTER V

BRAHMANICAL AND KṢATRIYA TRADITION

So far tradition has been considered in its more general aspect, but a survey of ancient Indian tradition discloses the fact that great differences exist in the character of its multitudinous tales; and we may examine now the main features, according to which traditions may be classified.

The first classification that obviously presents itself is the broad division into the two groups, traditions that are mythological and those that profess to deal with history. Instances of the former are Soma's abduction of Bṛhaspati's wife Tārā and the birth of their son Budha,<sup>2</sup> the birth of Ilā from Manu's sacrifice,<sup>3</sup> and the marriage of Śiva and Pārvati.<sup>4</sup> With such we have nothing to do here, though myths that explain the origin of the chief races said to have ruled ancient India may suggest clues for exploring the earliest conditions.

Taking then traditions that profess to deal with history, we find that many tales are manifestly and essentially brahmanic, such as the story of Vasiṣṭha, Viśvāmitra and king Triśaṅku in the Mahā-bhārata and Rāmāyaṇa,<sup>1</sup> that of Viśvāmitra and king Hariścandra in the Mārkaṇḍeya (7 and 8), and that of king Hariścandra, Rohita and Śunahṣepa in the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa<sup>2</sup> and Śāṅkhāyana Śrauta Sūtra.<sup>3</sup> Others are plainly kṣatriya tales, such as the ballad of king Satyavrata-Triśaṅku, Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra in the Puranas (p. 38), that of king Sagara in the Puranas (p. 38), and that of Bhīṣma and Ugrāyudha in the Harivānśa (p. 37). Others again are neither kṣatriya nor brahmanical precisely, but combine features of both those classes and are thus of a mixed or intermediate character, such as the story of Agastya and Lopāmudrā (p. 38), that of king Mitrasaha Kalmāṣapāda,<sup>4</sup> and that of king Janamejaya II Pārikṣita who hurt Gārgya's son.<sup>5</sup> And there is a fourth class, namely, stories which have obviously been devised in order to explain names.

The contrast between the stories about Triśaṅku, Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra shows clearly that there were two classes of tradition, the brahmanic and the kṣatriya (see p. 6). This is only what might be naturally expected. This distinction in tradition, brahmanic and kṣatriya, is very important and may be paralleled by the difference between legends of saints and tales of chivalry. Brahmanic tradition speaks from the brahmanical standpoint, describes events and expresses feelings as they would appear to brahmans, illustrates brahmanical ideas, maintains and inculcates the dignity, sanctity, supremacy and even superhuman character of brahmans, enunciates brahmanical doctrines and advocates whatever suberved the interests of brahmans;<sup>6</sup> often enforcing the moral by means of marvellous incidents, that not seldom are made up of absurd and utterly impossible details. It often introduces kings, because kings were their chief patrons, yet even so the brahmans' dignity is never forgotten. Kṣatriya tradition, on the other hand, speaks from the kṣatriya standpoint, describes events and expresses feelings as they would appear to kṣatriyas, is concerned chiefly with kings and heroes and their great deeds, and displays the ideas and code of honour of kṣatriyas. It notices rishis who came into contact with kings, but otherwise is not much concerned with the life and thoughts of rishis. Kṣatriya tales do often indulge in the marvellous, but their marvels are generally mere exaggeration without any didactic purpose; and kṣatriya tradition, even when magnifying the glory of kings, does not disparage brahmans but acknowledges their character and position, though not in the excessive terms often employed in brahmanic tales. Kṣatriya genealogies are of necessity of kṣatriya origin.

The difference between the two kinds of tradition is best brought out where fortunately both the kṣatriya and the brahmanic versions exist. That is found in the stories about Triśanku, Vasistha and Viśvāmitra. The kṣatriya ballad gives a simple and natural account of Triśanku's fortunes as affected by those two rishis, while the brahmanical versions are a farrago of absurdities and impossibilities, utterly distorting all the incidents.<sup>1</sup> But it is rare that the two aspects of a story are presented so characteristically, and what is found very often is a story which suggests that it was a kṣatriya version which has been subsequently revised according to brahmanic ideas—that is, a story of the third or intermediate class. The legend of Sunahṣepa presents different stages of this process.<sup>2</sup> Thus kṣatriya tales sometimes exist without brahmanic counterparts, such as the above story of king Sagara, many brahmanic tales exist without kṣatriya counterparts, and the intermediate class is abundant.

Another marked difference appears between kṣatriya tales on the one hand, and brahmanical tales and tales of an intermediate character on the other hand. In kṣatriya tales there is generally some historical consistency, but the two other classes are generally deficient in the historical sense, often revealing a total lack of it. This lack of the historical sense in ancient Indian literature is a commonplace (p. 2), but it does not hold entirely good as regards kṣatriya tradition. Before the invention of writing, genealogies, ballads and tales are practically the only literature of an historical kind that can exist. Genealogies are essentially chronological; and the old tales, especially those narrated in the course of the best versions of the genealogies, have also an historical character. Royal genealogies certainly do not lack the historical sense, and those kṣatriya tales and ballads are generally consistent in their historical conditions. Since the brahmans did treasure up and hand down the ancient hymns, there is nothing impossible in holding that the sūtas also displayed similar care in preserving traditions committed to their charge, as pointed out in chapter II, until the Purana was compiled, and there were men and brahmans who made old tales and genealogies their special concern.

The lack of the historical sense was a special characteristic of the brahmans. The Vedic texts, notoriously, are not books of historical purpose, nor do they deal with history (p. 2). Before the introduction of writing the brahmans had, like every one else, to rely on tradition when referring to preceding times, and, even after writing was introduced, they discountenanced it so far as their religious books were concerned. There is no want of references to prior events in the Rigveda as well as some to contemporaneous occurrences, and allusions to bygone men and events were necessarily drawn from tradition, such as those to Nahuṣa, Yayāti and others, who were ancient even then. So also the mention of Yadu, Turvaśa (Turvasu), Druhyu, Anu and Pūru is generic, referring to the families and kings descended from them, and not to the progenitors themselves, who had passed away into tradition even then. Similarly as regards Bharata, his descendants are introduced, but he himself was a bygone figure.

The lack of the historical sense, especially among brahmans, while on the one hand it failed to compose genuine history or fabricated incorrect stories and fables, on the other hand has been of valuable service in that it often neglected to revise or harmonize historical tradition. Positively it was a defect, negatively it was often a safeguard, with the result that the Puranic brahmans preserved a large mass of kṣatriya and popular tradition, which was inconsistent with brahmanic stories and tenets, and the bearing of which thereon they did not perceive. Thus not seldom they unconsciously passed on traditions which are a check on brahmanic statements and often refute much of them. When we seek for explanations of the lack, differences of opinion arise. It was not for want of history. There were plenty of historical events in the earliest times (p. 3).

A reason assigned for the lack is that 'the Brahmans, whose task it would naturally have been to record great deeds, had early embraced the doctrine that all action and existence are a positive evil, and could therefore have felt but little inclination to chronicle historical events.<sup>1</sup> But, as already pointed out, that was not the task of the brahmans but of the sūtas, and what they preserved was incorporated in the Puranas. When the literature of tradition passed into brahmanic custody later, the brahmans were prevented in two ways; first, since the Puranas dealt with ancient tradition, they could not incorporate into them the doings of later kings; and secondly, the above reason applied from the time when the brahmans embraced that doctrine, namely, in and after the age of the Brāhmaṇas and Upaniṣads, when, according to tradition as already explained, Puranas had been compiled.<sup>2</sup> Thenceforward they added no fresh historical events beyond incorporating the account of the dynasties of the Kali age. That doctrine, and its consequence that men should strive to be rid of further existence, was later than the Rigvedic age. The primitive doctrine was different. Asceticism has been practised ardently in India at all times, but its object varied. Under that doctrine it became the means of training the body and mind to a condition which ended virtually in non-existence; but in ancient times the rishis aimed at acquiring superhuman faculties and powers or the reputation of possessing them, and asceticism was the means by which that could be attained. During all that time it was the sūtas who preserved tradition.

There have been, broadly speaking, three classes among brahmans throughout Indian history, namely, (1) the ascetic devotee and teacher, the rishi or muni; (2) the priest and spiritual guide of kings, nobles and people; and (3) the minister of state, royal officer, and those who followed secular employments. The first was the brahman par excellence, the saint; the second the priest and preceptor; and the third the semi-secular brahman and sometimes wholly a layman. The first class, devoting itself to an ascetic life, lived apart in secluded hermitages. The second dwelt in cities and towns, ministering to their royal and other patrons, and conversant with what went on around them; they were not ordinarily religious thinkers. The third class were busied chiefly or altogether with

Kings performed sacrifices through their own priests, but invoked the aid of celebrated rishis also on special occasions as various stories show. Both the first and second classes appear to have composed the Rigvedic hymns, but the Brāhmaṇas and Upaniṣads were the product of the meditations and speculations of the first class. These men lived away from the world, immersed in spiritual problems and in close relation to the influences of Nature. Their religious rites, meditations and questionings were deeply and continuously concerned with the divine; the gods were very real to them. Mythology therefore was not an abstract subject, but as real to them as Nature. On the other hand, kings and political life belonged to a sphere with which they had nothing to do and of which they knew little or nothing personally; and political vicissitudes did not affect them. All that they knew of such matters was what penetrated into their seclusion through popular report and tale, mere hearsay, often less real to them than mythology and of far less importance. There was no vivid distinction between history and mythology, and naturally there was a constant tendency to confuse the two, to mythologize history and give mythology an historical garb. We can thus see why there was a total lack of the historical sense among the brahmans who composed the brahmanical literature. It is of course authoritative on the religious matters of which it treats, but one cannot extend its authority to secular matters.

The lack of the historical sense was a fertile source of confusion. It displayed itself in various ways that will be noticed now, and many other illustrations will present themselves in future chapters.<sup>2</sup>

First, it confused different persons of the same name. Preliminary confusion between two different persons, Bali, the Ānava king of the Eastern region, and Bali Vairocana, the demon king, is found in the story of the former,<sup>1</sup> where three Puranas call him Dānava and Vairocana,<sup>2</sup> in spite of the fact that they give his genealogy as Ānava and make no mention of any Virocana among his ancestors. Further confusion is seen in the allusions to 'king Janaka', for Janaka was the family name of the kings of Videha and various Janakas are distinguished in epic and Puranic tradition,<sup>3</sup> but in brahmanic literature Janaka is regarded as one king.<sup>4</sup> Similarly rishis of the same name were confused: thus the first Viśvāmitra is wrongly called Bharata-rsabha in the story of Śunahṣepa (p. 10); and this term really belonged to one of his descendants long afterwards, probably the Viśvāmitra who was priest to Sudās, i.e. Sudāsa, king of north Pañcāla, who was descended from Bharata.<sup>5</sup> Two other brahmanical books<sup>6</sup> confuse the two Viśvāmitras by reversing the blunder, in styling the descendant 'Gāthī's son', who was the first Viśvāmitra. Again, the Rāmāyaṇa wrongly identifies the Viśvāmitra of Rāma's time with the first Viśvāmitra,<sup>7</sup> and naïvely makes Śatānanda narrate in 'Viśvāmitra's' presence the fable of the first Viśvāmitra's discomfiture by Vasiṣṭha.<sup>8</sup> Similarly, the Vasiṣṭhas, of whom there were many, as will be shown in chapter XVIII, were often confused, until at length they were all regarded as one,<sup>9</sup> who was cirajivin: and so also all the Mārkandeyas were reckoned as only one,<sup>10</sup> and the Br̥haspatis are confused.<sup>11</sup>

An excellent instance of this kind of confusion is that of the two Sukas. One Suka had a daughter Kṛtvī or Kirtti, who married Anuha king of South Pañcāla and was mother of king Brahmadatta.<sup>12</sup>

The other was Vyāsa's son,<sup>1</sup> far later. It will be shown in chapter XIII that Brahmadatta was a contemporary of the Kaurava king Pratīpa, and that his great great grandson Janamejaya was a contemporary of Pratīpa's great grandson Bhīṣma and of Pṛṣata (Drupada's father). Bhīṣma was of about the same age as Satyavatī, the maiden-mother of Vyāsa,<sup>2</sup> for he was a youth when his father Śantanu married young Satyavatī;<sup>3</sup> hence Vyāsa was younger than Bhīṣma, and his son Śuka was therefore at least a generation later. From Brahmadatta's grandfather Śuka down to Vyāsa's son Śuka there were therefore some six generations. The kṣatriya genealogies and traditions keep the two Śukas distinct, but the brahmanical vāṁśas in their attempt to construct Vyāsa's family identify the two, give Vyāsa's son Śuka a daughter Kīrtimatī, say she was Anuha's queen and Brahmadatta's mother, and so make Brahmadatta great grandson of Vyāsa,<sup>4</sup> thus misplacing Anuha and Brahmadatta from their true position to one some six generations later. Kṣatriya tradition is right, and the brahmanical lack of the historical sense produces the absurdity that Anuha or Brahmadatta would have been king of south Pañcāla at the time of the Bhārata battle when, as the Mahābhārata shows, Drupada was reigning there.

Another instance may be cited from the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa (xiii, 5, 4, 9 and 21). It says that Bharata seized the sacrificial horse of the Satvants, and adds that his descendants, the Bharatas, were greater than those of any other king. Here it has confused Bharata, the famous Paurava king, with apparently Bharata, the brother of Rāma of Ayodhyā. King Bharata was long prior to the Satvants or Sātvatas, as the synchronisms and the Table of royal genealogies show (chapters XII to XIV), but Rāma and Bharata of Ayodhyā were their contemporaries, and this story is no doubt connected with the conquest of the Śūrasena territory from the Sātvatas and its occupation by Rāma's brother Satrughna, as will be noticed in chapter XIV. It would have been this Bharata who could have carried off the sacrificial horse, and it was the descendants of the Paurava Bharata, who were the famous Bharatas.

Secondly, the brahmans confused kings, rishis and others with mythological persons of the same names, for names were common to both then as down even to modern times.<sup>1</sup> A few instances of such confusion may be noticed here. Bṛhaspaṭi, the Āṅgirasa rishi, who lived just before Bharata's time,<sup>2</sup> is confused with the divine priest Bṛhaspati.<sup>3</sup> Madhu, the great Yādava king,<sup>4</sup> from whom Kṛṣṇa obtained the patronymic Mādhava, is called a Daitya, a Dānava and an asura,<sup>5</sup> being apparently confused with the demon Madhu whom Viṣṇu killed. Such cases of confusion led to the fabrication of brahmanical fables, and not a few other fables may be suspected to have arisen through similar misunderstanding.

Another instance is that of Tapati, wife of the Paurava king Saṁvarana. She was daughter of Sūra, Sūrya, or Tapana.<sup>6</sup> These words are treated as meaning 'the sun',<sup>7</sup> and a fable is told how Saṁvarana's priest, a Vasiṣṭha, went to the sun and obtained Tapati for him.<sup>8</sup> But those words were probably the name of a man, for other names of the sun were used as personal names, such as Prabhākara, Divākara and Bhānu. Sūrya appears to have been a real name, for the Suryas are spoken of along with the Bhṛgus and Kāṇvas,<sup>9</sup> and the patronymic Saurya is assigned to three rishis, the alleged authors of hymns x, 37, 158 and 170. But Tapati's father being confused with the sun, she became the sun's daughter, and accordingly she is foisted into the myth of the sun and his wives as his daughter along with his sons Manu Vaivasvata, Yama and the Aśvins,<sup>10</sup> confusing historical tradition with mythology and all with an utter disregard of chronological consistency.

Thirdly, the brahmans did not always distinguish between different periods, and so often misplaced persons chronologically and brought together as contemporaries persons who were widely separated in time. Such mistakes are innumerable, and only a few of the most glaring can be noticed here.

The brahmanical Sānti-parvan says that Bṛhma learnt dharma from Bhārgava Cyavana (who belonged to the very earliest age), from Vasiṣṭha and Mārkandeya (these are only gotra names), and from Rāma (that is, Jāmadagnya, who was long anterior).<sup>1</sup> Similarly, Drona is said to have visited Rāma Jāmadagnya.<sup>2</sup> The story of Utaṅka<sup>3</sup> is a farrago of absurdities and chronological errors, plainly brahmanical. So the Bṛhaddevatā (iv, 112) and the Vedārthadīpikā on Rigveda iii, 53 make the first Viśvāmitra (son of Gāthi or Gādhi) contemporary with Śakti Vasiṣṭha who was far later.<sup>4</sup> This chronological ignorance produces at times the most absurd positions, as where persons are made to describe events long posterior to their time; thus king Dilipa of Ayodhyā is instructed by his priest 'Vasiṣṭha' about Kamsa's tyranny and Kṛṣṇa's birth.<sup>5</sup>

Similarly lists are sometimes given of rishis as present at some gathering, although they belonged to widely different times and could not have been all alive together. The wildest instances of this are the lists of rishis who assembled at the twelve-year sacrifice in Naimiṣa forest;<sup>6</sup> of those who visited Bṛhma on his death-bed;<sup>7</sup> and of those who attended when Yudhiṣṭhira was installed as king.<sup>8</sup> Kings are sometimes jumbled together.<sup>9</sup> There are many other instances.<sup>10</sup> This lack of the historical sense must always be borne in mind when dealing with brahmanical statements in tradition; thus the order of the kings in Aitareya Brāhmaṇa vii, 5, 34 is wrong, being inverted for the most part.

Fourthly, the historical sense being lacking, the difference between reality and mythology became obliterated. So history was mythologized. The story of Tapati discussed above illustrates this.

Another instance is an account of Buddhism and Jainism.<sup>1</sup> There was war between the gods and asuras for a divine year, and the gods being worsted besought help of Viṣṇu. He produced Māyā-moha. This being went to the asuras and Daityas at the river Narbadā and beguiled them to forsake the Veda and their own dharma and to blaspheme the Veda, &c. They became Ārhatas. Then the gods renewed the battle and destroyed them. The terms Ārhatas, &c., used show that Buddhism and Jainism<sup>2</sup> are meant, and that river is made the place of their origin. The whole story is mythologized, the Buddhists and Jains become asuras and Daityas, and the struggle between brahmanism and them is turned into a war between gods and demons.<sup>3</sup>

Another excellent instance of this is the development of 'Aurva Agni'. There was a Bhārgava rishi named Urva. The traditional history about him and his descendants will be set out in chapter XVII, and here it is sufficient to state the salient points briefly. Urva's son was Ṛcika, his son was Jamadagni, and his son was Rāma; and a descendant was Agni in Sagara's time. All these were therefore Aurvas. Jamadagni means 'devouring fire'—Rāma according to the brahmanical fable destroyed all kṣatriyas off the earth twenty-one times—and Aurva might be treated as meaning 'born from the thigh' (ūru), and also 'belonging to the earth' (urvī). These names and ideas developed a fable which appears in two forms. According to the first form<sup>4</sup> the Bhārgavas were cruelly treated by the Haihayas, Aurva was born then from his mother's thigh, blinding the Haihayas with his blaze; filled with wrath he determined to destroy the world, but cast the fire of his wrath into the sea, where it became the submarine fire. According to the second form,<sup>5</sup> from Urva's thigh was born Aurva Agni, a fuel-less fire, eager to burn up the world, but it was assigned to the submarine region, and this fire is the fire

Another instance is the curious Pitr-vamśa.<sup>3</sup> The seven classes of Pitṛs had each one mind-born daughter (mānasī kanyā), namely, Menā, Acchodā (-Satyavatī), Pīvarī, Go, Yaśodā, Virajā and Narmadā. The account (subject to minor variations) stands thus. Menā was wife of Mount Himavant. They had a son Mount Maināka and three daughters, Aparṇā, Ekaparṇā and Ekapātalā. Aparṇā became the goddess Umā; Ekaparṇā married the rishi Asita and had a son the rishi Devala; and Ekapātalā married Sataśilāka's son, the rishi Jaigīṣavya, and had two sons, Saṅkha and Likhita. Acchodā, the river, transgressing against the Pitṛs, was born as a low-caste maiden (lāseyī) from king Vasu of Cedi and a fish who was the apsaras Adrikā; and she became (Kālī) Satyavatī, who was mother of Vyāsa by Parāśara, and of Vicitra-vīrya and Cītrāṅgada<sup>4</sup> by king Śantanu. Pīvarī was wife of Vyāsa's son Śi ka, and had five sons and a daughter Kīrtimatī who was Anuha's queen and Brahmadatta's mother.<sup>5</sup> Go, called also Ekaśringā, married the great rishi Śukra and was ancestress of the Bhṛgus. Yaśodā was wife of Viśvamahat, daughter-in-law of Vṛuddhaśarman, and mother of Dilīpa II Khaṭvāṅga.<sup>6</sup> Virajā was wife of Nahuṣa and mother of Yayāti.<sup>7</sup> Narmadā, the river, was wife of Purukutsa and mother of Trasadasyu.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Two kings of Ayodhyā. The genealogies say Purukutsa's wife was Narmadā, without connecting her with the river, Vā 88, 74 : Bd iii, 63, 73 (which has lost 3 lines) : Br 7, 95–6 : Hv 12, 714–5 : Śiv vii, 60, 79 : Kūr i, 20, 27–8 : Gar i, 138, 24. Here genuine genealogy is mixed up with mythology, and the whole of this vamśa of the Pitr-kanyās arose out of a misunderstanding of this word. The genealogies say that Nahuṣa's sons were born of pitr-kanyā Virajā,<sup>1</sup> connect a pitr-kanyū with Viśvamahat,<sup>2</sup> and call Kṛtvī a pitr-kanyū.<sup>3</sup> There can be no doubt that the word meant 'father's daughter', that is 'sister', for union between brother and sister was not unknown, as Rigveda x, 10 about Yama and Yami shows. Nahuṣa and Viśvamahat married their sisters or half-sisters, and the same may be presumed of Purukutsa and probably of Śukra and Suka. But the brahmans misunderstood or perverted the word to mean 'daughter of the Pitṛs'<sup>4</sup> (and therefore 'mind-born'), thus mythologizing it, and extended its use. Satyavatī, as a queen and great grandmother of the Pāṇḍavas, was ennobled by the kṣatriyas in the fable making her the offspring of Vasu, king of Cedi;<sup>5</sup> and, as mother of the great Vyāsa, by the brahmans in the additional fable that she was a daughter of the Pitṛs.<sup>6</sup> Menā was purely mythological, but Ekaparṇā and Ekapāṭalā<sup>7</sup> were mistakenly conjoined with Aparṇā-Umā, probably through some similarity in names, much as in the case of Tapatī discussed above.

The converse also occurred: mythology was not only freely brought into tales but was also turned into history. Thus Śiva and Pārvatī are introduced into the account of the long war between the Haihayas and the kings of Kāśī<sup>8</sup> dealt with in chapter XIII; and Indra into the story of Vasiṣṭha, Viśvāmitra and Triśaṅku and that of Hariścandra and Rohita mentioned above.<sup>9</sup> The aitihāsikas also, ix, 7, 1-3, but imply her identity with the river. Mat 12, 36 (where for Vasudo read Trasado) and Ag 272, 25 wrongly make her wife of Trasadasyu. Pad v, 8, 140 goes further wrong, making her wife of (Trasadasyu's son) Sambhūta. The identification of her with the river was a later fancy, as in MBh xv, 20, 549-50.

pushing their method to an extreme, declared that the Aśvins were two kings.<sup>1</sup>

Fifthly, the brahmans freely misapplied historical or other tradition to new places and conditions to subserve religious ends. Thus they transferred the story of Hariścandra, Rohita and Śunahśepa<sup>2</sup> and that of Purūravas<sup>3</sup> to the Godāvarī in order to enhance its glory in the Gautami-māhātmya. They connected Rāma with the R. Lauhitya (Brahmaputra),<sup>4</sup> and Urvaśi with that river<sup>5</sup> and also Mt. Malaya.<sup>6</sup>

Sixthly, the brahmans took some person or incident from historical tradition and freely fabricated edifying religious tales thereon, such as those of kings Hariścandra,<sup>7</sup> Śūrasena<sup>8</sup> and Jayadhvaja.<sup>9</sup>

Each of these classes of tradition may now be considered more in detail.

Kṣatriya tradition comprises genealogies, tales, notices and allusions. The genealogies will be dealt with fully in chapters VII to IX. The tales are of two kinds—those that appear to be historical and those that manifestly are merely laudatory. The former are generally told simply and naturally without excessive exaggeration, and have the appearance of being ancient and genuine, for it is very improbable that they could have been the work of Puranic brahmans, so that they must have belonged to the ancient kṣatriya traditions preserved by the sūtas. They are most trustworthy when narrated simply. The best occur in the genealogies, such as the Puranic stories of Satyavrata-Triśaṅku and Sagara, mentioned above; and others that occur elsewhere are those of Duṣyanta and Śakuntala,<sup>10</sup> Saṁvaraṇa and Vasiṣṭha,<sup>11</sup> Bhīṣma and Ugrayudha.<sup>12</sup> They are open to doubt the more they are elaborated and amplified, the most striking example being the detailed account of the early kings of the Vaiśāli dynasty in the Mārkanḍeya,<sup>13</sup> wherein occur many anachronisms such as the introduction of Agastya in the earliest times (115, 16).

The laudatory tales are not generally of historical value, for they are often exaggerated, sometimes absurd or impossible, and frequently violate chronology, such as Rāma Dāśarathi's alleged fight with Rāma Jāmadagnya<sup>1</sup> and that of Bhīṣma with the same,<sup>2</sup> for Rāma Jāmadagnya lived long before them : but sometimes such tales are expressed in less extravagant terms, such as the praise of Arjuna Kārtavīrya<sup>3</sup> and Māndhāṭṛ,<sup>4</sup> though even these are highly coloured.

All tales however narrated in the genealogies are not kṣatriya tradition, and some are patently brahmanical, such as those of the rishi Saubhari and Māndhāṭṛ's fifty daughters,<sup>5</sup> of king Vasumanas,<sup>6</sup> and of king Jayadhvaja and his brothers.<sup>7</sup> The first is a pure brahmanic marvel, the second conveys a brahmanic discourse, and the third extols Viṣṇu's supremacy. The contrast between these and true kṣatriya tradition is striking and unmistakable, and such stories inserted in the genealogies are generally found only in the later Puranas.

Notices and allusions occur in the genealogies and elsewhere, and are most trustworthy when introduced naturally, appropriately and simply, such as the mention of Gaurī and her son king Māndhāṭṛ in the Paurava genealogy,<sup>8</sup> that of Datta Ātreya in connexion with Arjuna Kārtavīrya,<sup>9</sup> and of king Krta as disciple of Hiranyanābha Kausalya.<sup>10</sup> The Brahmāṇḍa, Vāyu, Brahma, Harivāṁśa and Matsya have the best and most valuable allusions of this kind ; others have few, and some have none, such as the Garuḍa and Agni, because they are merely late and concise compilations. Where notices and allusions occur in tales or discourses, their value depends greatly on their context, and they are per se the less trustworthy, the more their context is brahmanical, because the brahmans lacked the historical sense: thus, for instance in the brahmanical version of the story of Śunahṣepa the appellation Bharata-ṛṣabha given to Viśvāmitra is entirely wrong as mentioned above; and so also the introduction of Agastya into a story about king Nahuṣa,<sup>1</sup> for the Agastyas did not exist then.

Taking next brahmanical tradition and considering those tales only that profess to have a historical basis, three groups may be distinguished:—(1) those that extol rishis and brahmans, (2) those that advocate or describe the merits of tirthas, and (3) those that commend religious doctrines, rites and observances. Such tales too often indulge in marvels or impossibilities, and it is not always easy to divide the quasi-historical tales from fables that are mythological, for the former have a tendency to treat their subject-matter in a mythological way or to introduce mythology. With this qualification some instances of the three groups may be given.

In the first group may be mentioned the story of the rishi Saubhari's marrying the fifty daughters of Māndhāṭṛ, king of Ayodhyā,<sup>2</sup> that of Jamadagni's death and Rāma's killing the kṣatriyas off the earth twenty-one times,<sup>3</sup> and the extraordinary tale of Galava and Yayāti's daughter,<sup>4</sup> to which was fabricated a sequel about Yayāti and his daughter's sons,<sup>5</sup> which is wholly fabulous. Some of such tales appear to have been developed out of incidental statements. Thus the story of Saubhari seems to have grown out of the statement in Rigveda viii, 19, 36, that Trasadasyu Paurukutsya gave Sobhari fifty maidens. That king was different from Trasadasyu Paurukutsa, grandson of Māndhāṭṛ, the Kākutstha, king of Ayodhyā, as will be shown in chapter XI, but the two Trasadasyus were confused, so that the Bṛhaddevatā says the maidens were Kākutstha maidens and thus implies that the Trasadasyu of the hymn was the Ayodhyā king, and adds that Sobhari obtained magnificent boons from Indra. The Viṣṇu improved thereon by definitely making the maidens Māndhātr's daughters, by describing those boons as in real existence and by adding many fanciful incidents. The Bhāgavata copied from the Viṣṇu.

Tales about tīrthas (the second group) generally introduce the marvellous or mythology, and it is rare to find any that are rational. So also tales that commend doctrines, rites and observances (the third group) are much the same in their character. Yet a few may be discovered that are rather of an ordinary kind, such as, among the former class, the story of Āpastamba-tīrtha,<sup>1</sup> and that of Bhānu-tīrtha where however the collocation of Madhucchandas with Śaryāti is absurd;<sup>2</sup> and among the latter class, the story of king Suvrata<sup>3</sup> and that of some of Kṛṣṇa's wives who were ravished by bandits after his death.<sup>4</sup>

Brahmanic tales generally are untrustworthy for traditional history, because of the lack of the historical sense; yet sometimes they introduce allusions of an historical kind incidentally, as well as geographical particulars and notices of other matters, and these are useful and sometimes even valuable; but the historical allusions can hardly be trusted of themselves, and should not be relied on unless they are corroborated from elsewhere. The Rāmāyaṇa is highly brahmanical and its stories fanciful and often absurd.

Next comes the intermediate class of stories that show both kṣatriya and brahmanical traits and sentiments combined. These are plainly composite. Since the kṣatriya features are older than the brahmanic as pointed out above, such stories must have been of kṣatriya origin and have been touched up afterwards by the Puranic brahmans. The reverse is not credible from what has been explained about the development of the Puranas. These stories display all grades of modification from tales that are mainly kṣatriya to tales that have become essentially brahmanic. Generally it is possible to trace out the modification only when different versions of the same story exist; but in most cases, while it is fairly evident that modification has taken place, it can only be conjectured what the changes have been.

Kṣatriya stories were often tampered with to subserve brahmanical interests, and different stages of this can be detected. Preliminary tampering is found in the Vāyu version of the story of Satyavrata Triśaṅku;<sup>1</sup> further tampering in the Vāyu account of king Janamejaya III's contest with the brahmans;<sup>2</sup> and still more in the story of king Mitrasaha Kalmāṣapāda, as the various versions show.<sup>3</sup> Where different versions do not exist, we can yet perceive that there has been tampering, as in the story of Agastya and Lopāmudrā.<sup>4</sup> The furthest development occurs where the brahmans took some incident in kṣatriya tradition and enlarged it, till their story loses all resemblance to a kṣatriya tale and becomes a brahmanical fable, as in the above story of Aurva.

It is mainly the brahmanical mistakes and absurdities that have discredited the Puranas. If, however, we put them aside and consider statements and stories that are evidently of kṣatriya origin and have not been over-tampered with by the brahmans, it is remarkable what an amount of consistency they reveal, though unconnected and drawn from different contexts.

The fourth class of stories is connected with names and comprises two kinds, first, statements or anecdotes that provide explanations of names, and secondly, statements or anecdotes that have grown from misunderstanding or misapplication of names.

Of the first kind, some appear to be ancient and may be genuine, such as the explanation of Pañcāla from pañca alam, which began as a jocose nickname, the 'Five capables', given to the five sons of king Bhṛmyaśva in consequence of a jocular boast of his;<sup>5</sup> of the nickname Nandanodaradundubhi of a Yādava king;<sup>6</sup> and possibly of the name Triśaṅku.<sup>7</sup> But most of such stories have been coined out of the names themselves, sometimes fanciful, sometimes mistaken, and sometimes absurd. Some no doubt arose from popular etymology, but many were certainly the invention of Puranic brahmans. Some may be fairly old, though silly, as that Ikṣvāku was so named because Manu sneezed,<sup>8</sup> and that Śāsāda got his name because he ate a hare.<sup>1</sup> But many, if not most, are obviously late fabrications, being sometimes fashioned with grotesque ingenuity, such as those explaining the names Māndhātr,<sup>2</sup> Videha,<sup>3</sup> Jarāsandha,<sup>4</sup> Gāndīni<sup>5</sup> and Bharadvāja.<sup>6</sup> These are quite on a par with similar explanations in brahmanical books, such as those of Atri,<sup>7</sup> Ayāsya and Aṅgiras,<sup>8</sup> and yūpa.<sup>9</sup>

Of the second kind appear to be the following. Kurukṣetra was so named because king Kuru ploughed it,<sup>10</sup> whereas it really denoted that it was his cultivated territory,<sup>11</sup> east of which lay his tract (apparently less cultivated) called Kurujāngala.<sup>12</sup> Sītā received her name, because her father Sīradhvaja<sup>13</sup> found her in a furrow (sītā),<sup>14</sup> whereas it was a natural feminine name expressing the idea of human propagation found in kṣetra, kṣetraja and bija (cf. Ahalyā); and the mistake led on to the epithet ayonijā given her.<sup>15</sup> Arjuna Kārtavīrya had a thousand arms (bāhu-sahasra),<sup>16</sup> whereas it seems probable he had the name Sahasrabāhu.<sup>17</sup>

It is clear therefore that the kṣatriya tales found in the Puranas, especially those that are genuinely kṣatriya, belonged to the ancient body of tradition prior to the composition of the Purana. This is a very important conclusion. The Puranic brahmans took over the kṣatriya traditions; some they preserved without modification; but others they re-shaped more or less according to brahmanic ideas, and these form a considerable portion of the intermediate or combined class mentioned above. Different stages of that process are discernible, as has been noticed.

CHAPTER VI

THE PURANAS AND THEIR GENEALOGICAL TEXTS

THE genealogies of the ancient dynasties are the chief data of an historical kind, and the investigation of traditional history must begin with them. They are given more or less fully by all the Puranas, except the late Varāha, Vāmana, Skanda, Nāradīya and Brahmavaivarta, and the Bhavisya which does not deal with the ancient past. Some are found in the Mahābhārata and Rāmāyaṇa. All the accounts are in verse in the śloka metre, except some parts in the Mahābhārata and most of the Viṣṇu. The most important Puranas as regards genealogies are the Vāyu and Brahmānda, the Brahma and Harivamśa, the Matsya (with book V of the Padma) and the Viṣṇu.

The Vāyu and Brahmānda have the best text of the genealogies. Their accounts agree closely, so that they are really only two versions of the same text. They have a great part of their contents in common, generally almost verbatim, and it appears they were originally one Purana. This is indicated also by the lists given in the Puranas.<sup>1</sup> Nearly all mention the Brahmānda, putting it last, and omit the Vāyu, though it was one of the best known. The Kūrma<sup>2</sup> also mentions it last and calls it the Vāyavīya Brahmānda. The Vāyu and Brahmānda are named separately only in the Vāyu itself and the Garuḍa.<sup>3</sup> These lists are of course late insertions, which could not have been completed till after the latest of these Puranas was composed ; yet they show that the two were not regarded as distinct and the differentiation of the one original into two versions with separate names was a later process. Both these Puranas say they were declared by the god Vāyu ;<sup>1</sup> thus both were Vāyu-prokta and either might be so described ; but the use of the name Brahmāndā in the above lists to the general exclusion of the name Vāyu suggests that Brahmāndā was the older and better-known name. Their version may be conveniently called the 'Vāyu version'.

The editions cited are the Ānandaśrama for the Vāyu, and the Veṅkaṭeśvara for the Brahmāndā. Where they differ, the former is generally preferable, because the latter is not a critical edition, and also appears to have been silently emended by the editor, as, for instance, where it reads iti śrūtaḥ and viśrūtaḥ instead of iti śrutiḥ (p. 19), and probably where it avoids a difficulty by substituting yogeśvarasya for Pauroravasya (i.e. Paurūravasya).<sup>2</sup> But the Vāyu is not invariably better, because sometimes corruptions have passed undetected in it, as where the Viṣṇuvṛddhas have been misplaced,<sup>3</sup> and where it reads Ayāsyā's name wrongly.<sup>4</sup> The Brahmāndā has unfortunately one very serious lacuna in its account after iii, 74, 103, where the latter half of the Ānava genealogy, the whole of that of the Paūravas, and a portion of the Kali age dynasties have been lost, namely, all the matter contained in Vāyu 99, 102–290. These two appear to be the oldest of the Puranas that we possess now, and are on the whole the most valuable in all matters of traditional history.

The Brahma and Harivāṁśa agree closely in their genealogical account and have practically the same text, subject to small variations. The Brahma is cited from the Ānandaśrama edition. The Harivāṁśa text (Calcutta edition) is better than the Brahma, for the latter has suffered through losses ; thus it is manifestly incomplete in the North Pañcāla genealogy, and most copies of it omit the Cedi-Magadha dynasty descended from Kuru (chapter IX). Their version is very similar to the 'Vāyu version', and has the same basis, and appears to be a revision of that version. Sometimes it has omissions, sometimes additions which seem to contain genuine tradition, sometimes it varies, and sometimes it makes mistakes. It may be called the 'Harivamśa version'. It is manifestly later than the 'Vāyu version', and this is best illustrated by the fact that it gives two incompatible origins for the Kānyakubja and Kāśi dynasties, one in each case being necessarily wrong, devised at a later time when erroneous views had obtained currency.

The genealogical record in the Matsya has peculiarities. It may be considered in three parts, (1) its account of the Aikṣvākus, Śāryātas and other sons of Manu, (2) its account of the early Ailas down to Yayāti, and (3) its genealogies of the five Aila races, Yādavas, Pauravas, &c. This third part resembles the 'Vāyu version', and appears to be based on the same original text, and to be not a revision but a distinct version which early became separate. Its variations are additions, omissions, condensations and sometimes corruptions; and on the whole its agreement with the 'Vāyu version' occurs more in the strictly genealogical statements and less in the incidental or collateral matter. The two other parts (1) and (2) differ from the 'Vāyu version', the verses being quite different. The pedigrees are in the main the same, though there are wide divergencies or corruptions in names in the second part and marked disagreements at several stages in the first part. In the first part the account is very concise, without any of the tales and allusions that diversify the 'Vāyu version'. The second part is briefer than the 'Vāyu version', the legends are narrated differently, and some interpolations occur. On the whole the Matsya record is a valuable and in many points independent authority.

The genealogical account in the Padma<sup>1</sup> is in book V, and is practically the same as the Matsya version so far as it goes, the differences being generally small and verbal. It is therefore valuable as a means of checking the Matsya text.

The Viṣṇu account is mainly in prose, with old verses introduced occasionally. It is generally in agreement with the 'Vāyu and Harivamśa versions' in the structure of its genealogies, sometimes agreeing rather with the former as in the Aikṣvāku dynasty, and sometimes rather with the latter as in the cases of the Yādavas and Pauravas; but it also has omissions, variations, additions, and 'embellishments' of its own. It leaves out some of the incidents in those versions, condenses others (as for instance, the famous story of Satyavrata Trīśāṅku of Ayodhyā<sup>1</sup>), and adds others again, which are brahmanical fables (as the story of the rishi Saubhari and king Māndhāṭī's daughters)<sup>2</sup> or brahmanized legends (as the story of king Kalmāṣapāda),<sup>3</sup> or tales that seem to have some basis of genuine tradition but have been half mythologized (as the story of Purukutta and Narmadā).<sup>4</sup> The verses it intersperses are manifestly quotations from older metrical versions, and agree sometimes with the Vāyu and Harivāṁśa versions. It is a late Purana, composed as a single whole upon a consistent plan, and not a collection of materials of various times, as we find in the Vāyu, Brahma and Matsya. From its account of Buddhism and Jainism (p. 68) it appears to have been composed after brahmanism had recovered its supremacy, so that it cannot be earlier than about the fifth century, A.D.<sup>5</sup> and it is brahmanical.

Three other Puranas contain all or nearly all the genealogies, the Garuḍa, Agni<sup>6</sup> and Bhāgavata.<sup>7</sup> Their accounts are all late re-compilations, the Bhāgavata being one of the very latest, about the ninth century A.D. They do not reproduce any of the old verses except rarely, but have re-stated the genealogies in fresh verses, generally in more condensed form. The Garuḍa and Agni give merely bald pedigrees with hardly any incidental allusions. The Garuḍa and Bhāgavata follow the Vāyu tradition as regards the Aikṣvākus, and the Agni the Matsya tradition. As regards the other dynasties, all three follow in a general way the common tradition. The Bhāgavata has used the Viṣṇu in its composition, and so also has the Garuḍa apparently. All three however have peculiarities of their own. The Agni has erred seriously as regards the Kānyakubja and Kāśi dynasties. The Bhāgavata is fuller and contains stories and allusions, which show a marked brahmanical colouring and some corruptions; and it has taken considerable liberties with names. These three Puranas have no authority as regards the genealogies, yet are of use for comparison, and sometimes elucidate the older accounts. The Bhāgavata has a special value, where it restates traditions, found in the older Puranas, that do not harmonize with brahmanical assertions and pretensions and could not have originated with the brahmans; for the fact that it, a thoroughly brahmanical composition, affirms such traditions, is very strong testimony that the traditions were genuine and could not be discarded. It will be often cited therefore in this way.

<sup>5</sup> The list of the Puranas in Viṣṇu iii, 6, 22–4 could not have been completed until the Bhāgavata and other very late Puranas had come into existence.

The Liṅga account is based on the 'Vāyu version', but adapts it to frame its own text. Often it has the same verses, but often also it modifies, curtails, and freely omits, especially incidental and descriptive matter; and it adds occasionally.<sup>1</sup> It also interpolates religious teaching, as where it introduces a long eulogy of Rudra (i, 65, 46 f.). It however shows traces of the influence of the Matsya version; thus it has the same verses sometimes,<sup>2</sup> and ends the Aikṣvāku genealogy with six kings instead of the Vāyu's twenty-one, just as the Matsya does. The Liṅga is useful for collating with the 'Vāyu version' when the verses agree, and for comparison where they vary; thus, it suggests (i, 65, 42-3) that the Vāyu's misplaced lines (88, 79<sup>b, c</sup>) about the Viṣṇuvṛddhas<sup>3</sup> should probably come after verse 74.

The Kūrma account is a composite production. Now and again it has a few lines like the Vāyu text,<sup>4</sup> and like the Maṭsyā text,<sup>5</sup> in the Aikṣvāku genealogy, but it follows the Matsya rather, where they differ. It is a late composition and shows brahmanical features; thus it omits most of the Vāyu's tales and introduces brahmanical fabrications instead: for instance, it makes Gautama (who was far later) a contemporary of Yuvanāśva I,<sup>6</sup> and tells long fables about king Vasumanas<sup>7</sup> and the Haihaya kings Jayadhvaja and Durjaya.<sup>8</sup>

The Śiva gives only the account of Manu and his offspring (vii, 60, 1), the Aikṣvākus (ibid., 33) and the Śāryātas (ibid., 20). Its text is similar to that of the 'Harivamśa version', but is less accurate and shortens or omits incidental and descriptive matter.

The Mārkandeya gives only the account of Manu's offspring (chaps. 111, 112) and the early part of the Vaiśala dynasty (chaps. 113-36, 109-10), and it narrates the latter at immense length with abundant imaginative description. Its text is its own.

The accounts in the Mahābhārata<sup>1</sup> are peculiar. They are partly in verse and partly in prose, and do not appear to be ancient. They will be noticed in connexion with the genealogies that they treat of.

The Rāmāyana<sup>2</sup> is, as it professes to be, altogether a brahmanical book. Some of its genealogies agree with those in the Puranas, and where it differs from them, as in the Aiksvāku line, it is manifestly wrong, as will be shown in chapter VIII. The legends it narrates or mentions are generally distorted according to brahmanical notions and through the brahmanical lack of the historical sense.<sup>3</sup>

In examining the genealogies it is of little profit and is likely to be misleading to deal with the accounts in the several Puranas separately. The only trustworthy course is first to collate the texts that generally agree and ascertain as far as possible what original text they indicate, and then construct the genealogy therefrom. By this method individual corruptions and errors can be corrected, losses and omissions remedied, and interpolations and alterations detected with reasonable confidence; and thus a text may be framed which approaches as nearly as is possible to the common original on which all those texts were based. At times divergences occur which are greater than can be so resolved, and we find competing texts, yet they are not on the whole so frequent or serious as to cause material difficulty; and small discrepancies do not really affect the general fabric of the genealogy.

The method here advocated cannot be merely one of pure verbal criticism; some scope must be allowed to discrimination and judgement based on a general study of the Puranic texts. Whether one's individual decisions on the reconstruction of the passages be sound or not must be tested by study devoted to the Puranas; but the principle is sound and provides the only sane way in which these genealogies can be examined. This is the method used here. The texts of the Puranas have been collated throughout, wherever doubtful points arose ; and wherever it is essential to elucidate the discussion, the text that appears to be most probably the nearest approach to the original common text is quoted. It will be often found that, though there may be scope for difference in the selection of particular words in framing the text, yet that does not affect the general sense of the passages, the purport being clear, though the words selected may vary. As an illustration of the advantage of collating the texts may be given the following passage, which shows how important may be what appear to be stray readings.

<sup>3</sup> e.g. its statement that Yadu was virtually a rākṣasa and his offspring were rākṣasas and yātudhānas (vii, 59, 14, 15, 20) is outrageous.

In the Solar line of Ayodhyā there were three early kings, Prasenajit, his son Yuvanāśva, and his son Māndhāṭṛ. The Brahmanāḍa and Vāyu say Gaurī was Yuvanāśva's wife—

atyanta-dhārmikā Gaurī tasya patni pati-vratā and call her son Māndhāṭṛ Gaurika.<sup>1</sup> But the Brahma, Harivamśa and Śiva say Gaurī was Prasenajit's wife, thus making her Māndhāṭṛ's grandmother.<sup>2</sup> The question arises, which of these accounts is right ? Now there was in the Paurava line an early king whose name is given as Matināra,<sup>3</sup> Antināra<sup>4</sup> and Ratināra,<sup>5</sup> and we may adopt Matināra as the form most often found, though Atināra may be the true original. The Vāyu, Matsya, and Harivamśa itself say he had a daughter Gaurī and she was mother of Māndhāṭṛ ;<sup>6</sup> the Harivamśa thus contradicting its statement in the former passage. It is clear then that she was wife of Yuvanāśva and not of Prasenajit ; and the phrase atyanta-dhārmikā in the above line supplies an interesting corroboration of this. This phrase is the general reading in the Brahmanāḍa and Vāyu, but two copies of the Vāyu read Atimāndātmajā instead, which is obviously a mistake for Atinārātmajā or Matinārātmajā, as she was Matināra's daughter ; and this rare reading is the right one and confirms the statement in the Paurava genealogy. But it was corrupted and was not understood, and so was altered to the intelligible but commonplace epithet atyanta-dhārmikā, which has now almost superseded that true reading. The Brahmanāḍa and Vāyu therefore have the correct relation, and the three other Puranas have altered it. It is possible to suggest a reason for their tampering with it. It was a very common trait to provide explanations of names, as shown in chapter V, and Māndhāṭr's name is explained in an absurd fable, which says he was born from his father Yuvanāśva's side.<sup>1</sup> That being accepted, it followed that Gaurī was not his mother, and so it was natural to transfer her as wife from Yuvanāśva to Prasenajit.

CHAPTER VII

GENERAL SURVEY OF THE GENEALOGIES

THE general scheme of the genealogies is here first sketched out, and the several dynasties will be dealt with in more detail in the next two chapters, the Solar race in chapter VIII and the Aila or Lunar race in chapter IX.

All the royal lineages are traced back to the mythical Manu Vaivasvata. He is said to have had nine sons,<sup>2</sup> and also a daughter named Ilā or an eldest son Ila who was turned into a woman Ilā.<sup>3</sup> Only four of the sons are important. The chief son Ikṣvāku reigned at Ayodhyā and had two sons Vikuṣi-Śāśāda and Nimi. From the former was descended the great Aikṣvāku dynasty of Ayodhyā, generally known as the Solar race, and the latter founded the dynasty of Videha. Another son Nābhānediṣṭha established the line of kings that reigned in the country known afterwards as the

<sup>2</sup> Bd. iii, 60, 2-3. Vā 85, 3-4. Br 7, 1-2. Hv 10, 613-14. Lg i, 65, 17-19. Śiv vii, 60, 1-2. Kūr i, 20, 4-6. Ag 272, 5-7. Cf. also Vā 64, 29-30; Bd. ii, 38, 30-2. These collated suggest this original text:—

Manor Vaivasvatasyāsan putrā vai nava tat-samāḥ
Ikṣvākuś caiva Nābhāgo Dhrṣṭaḥ Śaryātir eva ca
Nariṣyantas tathā Prāṁśur Nābhāgoḍiṣṭa eva ca
Karūṣaś ca Prāḍhṛaś ca navaite Mānavāḥ smṛtāḥ.

Viś iv, 1, 5 and MBh i, 75, 3140-1 agree generally therewith. The correct form of Nābhāgoḍiṣṭa is Nābhānediṣṭha, as Viś suggests. Gar i, 138, 2; Māṭk 79, 11-12 and 111, 4-5; and Bhāg ix, 1, 11-12 vary. Mat 11, 40-1 and Pad v, 8, 75-7 have a different text. MBh i, 1, 42-7 is a fanciful summary, incorrect.

kingdom of Vaiśāli; a third Śāryāti the dynasty that reigned in Ānarta (Gujarat); and from a fourth Nābhāga were descended the Rathitaras. These are discussed in chapter VIII.

Ilā had a son Purūravas Aila, the progenitor of the great Aila race, who reigned at Pratiṣṭhāna<sup>1</sup> (Allahabad). The early part of the Aila genealogy from him to Yayāti's five sons is given by twelve Puranas and twice by the Mahābhārata, and part is also given by the Rāmāyaṇa.<sup>2</sup>

Purūravas is said to have had six<sup>3</sup> or seven<sup>4</sup> sons, and there is some variation in their names,<sup>5</sup> but only two are important, and nearly all the authorities agree about them, namely, Āyu or Āyus, and Amāvasu. Āyu continued the main line at Pratiṣṭhāna, and from Amāvasu was descended the dynasty of Kānyakubja (Kanauj). Āyu had by Svarbhānu's daughter Prabhā five sons who are all mentioned as important, namely, Nahuṣa, Kṣatravṛddha (or Vṛddhaśarman), Rambha, Raji and Anenas (or synonymously Vipapman).<sup>6</sup> Nahuṣa continued the main line at Pratiṣṭhāna.

<sup>1</sup> Pratiṣṭhāna is Prayāga on the north bank of the Jumna; Vā 91, 50: Bd iii, 66, 21: Lg i, 66, 56. Br 10, 9–10 and Hv 26, 1371, 1411–2 say it is Prayāga but place it on the north bank of the Ganges. Mat 106, 30–2 suggests it was on the east side of the Ganges; cf. 111, 7–9.

<sup>4</sup> Br 10, 11–12 and Hv 26, 1372–3 differently. Lg i, 66, 57–8 (seven sons) and Kūr i, 22, 1–2 (six sons) are alike but intermediate and corrupt. MBh i, 75, 3149 (six sons) is somewhat alike. Mat 25, 33–4; Pad v, 12, 86–7 and Ag 273, 15, which have a different text, give eight names, corrupting most of them. Bhāg ix, 15, 1 is wrong.

<sup>6</sup> Bd iii, 67, 1–2. Vā 92, 1–2. Br 11, 1–2. Hv 28, 1475–6. These agree, except that Br and Hv call Kṣatravṛddha Vṛddhaśarman. Lg i, 66, 59–60 and Kūr i, 22, 3–4 are similar but name only Nahuṣa. Viṣ iv, 8, 1, Gar 139, 7–8 and Bhāg ix, 17, 1–2 concur in the names. Mat 24, 34–5, Pad v, 12, 87–8 and Ag 273, 16 agree, with different verses. MBh i, 75, 3150 varies. Svarbhānu was a Dānava king, MBh i, 65, 2532; 67, 2648: xii, 227, 8262–7. Cf. Vā 68, 8, 22, 24; Bd iii, 6, 8, 23–4; Mat 6, 20–1, and Viṣ i, 21, 6, which say Prabhā was his daughter. Svarbhānu was also a name of Rāhu, MBh v, 109, 3811: vi, 12, 481–8; 102, 4619: cf. Vā 52, 80; 53, 63–5, 83 (confused). The two must be distinguished, but Viṣ iv, 8, 1 (read Rāhor) confuses them. So also the Dānavas Sūrya and Candramas were different from the sun and moon, MBh i, 65, 2534–5: Bd iii, 6, 12: Vā 68, 12.

Kṣatravṛddha founded the dynasty of Kāśi (Benares), for the Brahma and Harivamśa, though they call him Vṛddhaśarman at first, give his lineage under his name Kṣatravṛddha.<sup>1</sup> From Raji were descended the Rājeya kṣatriyas, who perished (it is said) in a contest with Indra.<sup>2</sup> Rambha had no sons.<sup>3</sup> From Anenas sprang a line called the Kṣatradharmans, whose names as best ascertainable are these—Anenas, Kṣatradharma, Pratikṣatra, Sañjaya, Jaya, Vijaya, Kṛti (or Jaya), Haryatvata, Sahadeva, Adīna, Jayat-sena, Saṅkṛti, and Kṛtadharma (or Kṣatradharma).<sup>4</sup> They seem to have constituted a small dynasty somewhere, but nothing more is said about them: the second of these names became confused with Kṣatravṛddha, and so the Viṣṇu and Garuḍa drop out Anenas and attribute this lineage to Kṣatravṛddha erroneously:<sup>5</sup> and the last name also became confused with Kṣatravṛddha, whose lineage follows this pedigree, in the Brahma (11, 31), and was wrongly altered to Kṣatravṛddhā.

Nahuṣa had six<sup>6</sup> or seven<sup>7</sup> sons by pitr-kanyā Virajā, which no doubt means his sister (p. 70). Only two sons are important, Yati and Yayāti. Yati the eldest became a muni and gave up the kingdom,<sup>8</sup> and Yayāti succeeded to it. Yayāti had two wives, Devayānī daughter of the great Bhārgava rishi Uśanas-Śukra,<sup>9</sup> and Bhāg ix, 17, 11–12 wrongly gives Anenas a wholly different line of descendants. Bd and Vā preface this genealogy with a passage about king Marutta and Mitrajyotiś (verses 1–6) which has no connexion with it and seems misplaced. I do not know what its true connexion is.

Śarmiṣṭhā daughter of the Daitya-Dānava-asura king Viṣaparvan.<sup>1</sup> The former bore two sons, Yadu and Turvasu, and the latter three, Druhyu, Anu and Pūru.<sup>2</sup> Yayāti divided his territories among them, so that his kingdom developed into five kingdoms, and from his sons were descended the five famous royal lines of the Yadus or Yādavas, the Turvasus, the Druhyus, the Anus or Ānavas and the Purus or Pauravas.

Yadu had five<sup>3</sup> or four<sup>4</sup> sons, but only two are important, Sahasrajit (or Sahasrāda) and Kroṣṭu (or Kroṣṭr). With them the Yādavas divided into two great branches. Sahasrajit's descendants were named after his grandson Haihaya and were well known as the Haihayas.<sup>5</sup> Kroṣṭu's descendants had no special name, but were known particularly as the Yādavas. The Ānavas after Anu's seventh named successor Mahāmanas divided into two branches under two sons Uśinara and Titikṣu. The former branch established various kingdoms in the Panjab, and the latter founded a dynasty in East Bihar. The Pauravas gradually developed and established a number of kingdoms in Madhyadeśa. All these lines will be explained fully in chapter IX.

The broad results thus sketched out are exhibited in the annexed genealogical table.

The genealogies profess to give the dynastic lists at length and in correct succession, and say so expressly, vistareṇānupūrvyā ca, as regards the Yādava<sup>6</sup> and Paurava<sup>7</sup> lines. But in giving the Aikṣvāku genealogy of Ayodhyā the Puranas do not profess to be complete, and say that only the chief and best-known kings are mentioned.<sup>1</sup> These statements are noteworthy, because the three genealogies profess to cover exactly the same chronological period, all starting from Manu and all ending with the Bhārata battle. Yet, while the Aikṣvāku lists name some 93 kings, the Yādava lists give only about 53 kings, and the Paurava lists only some 45 kings in succession, and prefixing to each of these two the common anterior names Manu, Ilā, Purūravas, Āyu, Nahuṣa and Yayāti, these two lists make their totals 59 and 51 respectively. Moreover, the latter two lists profess to be given at length, while the first does not profess to be exhaustive. The Liṅga throws some light on the meaning of the word vistareṇa, in that, after setting out the list of Yādava names as fully as the Vāyu, it adds that it gives the list succinctly, sarikṣepena (i, 68, 1), which is explained by the fact that its account is more concise. Hence apparently vistareṇa does not imply that the list is exhaustive, but that it is the full traditional account. In fact it will be found that gaps occur sometimes in the genealogies, and in one place it is frankly admitted that there is a gap.<sup>2</sup>

The succession of kings in the lists is expressed in four ways, which may be explained by styling the predecessor A and the successor B; namely (1) B was son of A, (2) B was 'of A',<sup>3</sup> no relationship being expressed, (3) B was 'from or after A', the ablative being used or its adverbial form,<sup>4</sup> and (4) B was 'heir' of A.<sup>5</sup> The second and third forms are indistinguishable where the genitive and ablative cases are the same.<sup>6</sup> These different forms may all mean sonship; the last three may include the succession of other relatives, and the third may imply bare succession without particular relationship. None necessarily means immediate sonship<sup>7</sup> or succession<sup>1</sup> for even the first does not always mean it. Absolute precision in genealogical details can hardly be expected and is not indispensable for historical purposes. Kings who were celebrated are well known by name, and the names of others are mainly useful as marking steps in descent, so that it is not material whether insignificant names are perfectly correct. In such cases the name which is best supported is adopted, and the question of names is dealt with in chapter XI.

The fact that the genealogies of some dynasties are fuller than those of others will not be a serious bar chronologically, because synchronisms (which will be discussed in chapters XII to XIV) will fix the positions of the chief kings, and other kings will fall into approximate position accordingly; and thus it will appear where lists are incomplete or gaps occur. Though absolute accuracy is unattainable, yet it may be possible to reach an approximation sufficient for working purposes.

CHAPTER VIII

THE SOLAR RACE

Ayodhyā Dynasty.

THE genealogy of the kings of Ayodhyā, to whom were especially applied the titles, the 'Solar race', the Ikṣvākus, Aikṣvākus or Aikṣvākas, is given by many authorities. Thirteen Puranas give the whole list of kings more or less completely.<sup>2</sup> The Rāmāyaṇa gives the list down to Rāma twice.<sup>3</sup> The Mahābhārata mentions the early part as far as Dṛḍhāśva,<sup>4</sup> and other small portions elsewhere.<sup>1</sup> The Raghuvamśa has much of the latter half, from Dilipa II to Agnivarna.<sup>2</sup> All these authorities are on the whole in general agreement, so far as they extend, except the Rāmāyana. Its two lists are practically the same, but differ widely from the others. Most of its names occur in the other lists, but they are arranged in such absolutely different order that its lists cannot be reconciled with the others. There are thus two wholly distinct genealogies, and it is necessary to examine which is more probably right.

The Rāmāyana genealogy is open to great doubt, when considered as a whole or examined in detail. It contains only some 35 kings down to Rāma, whereas the Puranas name some 63 kings in that period, and it will be seen from a comparison of the other dynasties exhibited in the table of genealogies (chapter XIII) that its list is manifestly defective in length. It is very improbable that the Rāmāyana alone should be right and all the other authorities wrong; even the late Raghuvamśa accepting the latter and rejecting the former.

This conclusion is confirmed when the lists are examined in detail. We may first notice what are undoubted omissions in the Rāmāyana list. It omits Purukūtsa and his son Trasadasyu, but they were kings of this line as the Mahābhārata knows.<sup>3</sup> It omits Hariścandra and his son Rohita, yet brahmanical books testify to both.<sup>4</sup> Again it omits R̥tuparṇa, though he is mentioned in the story of Nala.<sup>5</sup> Also it omits Sudāsa, yet admits his existence by calling Kalmāṣapāda Saudāsa in its second list, and contradicts itself by saying Kalmāṣapāda was son of Raghu; and the Mahābhārata declares he was son of Sudāsa.<sup>6</sup> It omits Aśmaka, who according to that epic was Kalmāṣapāda's son.<sup>7</sup> As regards all these kings the Puranas name them and are corroborated by the other authorities mentioned above.

Next as regards the relationships and positions of kings. The Rāmāyāna places Ambarīṣa three steps above Nābhāga, but he was Nābhāga's son, for Ambarīṣa son of Nābhāga is praised in the epic.<sup>1</sup> It tells, moreover, the well-known story of Hariścandra<sup>2</sup> as a story of Ambarīṣa,<sup>3</sup> and Ambarīṣa may have been another name of Hariścandra;<sup>4</sup> but if so, it is wrong in making his son Nahusa instead of Rohita. The Puranas say there were two Dilipas, one father of Bhagīratha and the other father or grandfather of Raghu, but the Rāmāyāna mentions only one Dilipa as father of Bhagīratha and great grandfather of Raghu. One Dilipa was certainly father of Bhagīratha,<sup>5</sup> and the Raghuvamśa<sup>6</sup> supports the Puranas that Raghu was son of a Dilipa, who was necessarily a second Dilipa. Further the Rāmāyāna makes Raghu father of Kalmāṣapāda and places Aja twelve generations below Raghu, while the Puranas make Aja son of Raghu. Now Kalmāṣapāda was son of Sudāsa, even according to the Rāmāyāna as shown above, and not son of Raghu, and the Raghuvamśa (v, 35-6) corroborates the Puranas that Raghu's son was Aja. Again, the Rāmāyāna says Kalmāṣapāda's son was Śāṅkhāna, but his son was Aśmaka according to some Puranas<sup>7</sup> or Sarvakarman according to others.<sup>8</sup> The Mahābhārata corroborates the former of these statements in one passage and the latter in another,<sup>9</sup> thus contradicting the Rāmāyāna in either case; and the Raghuvamśa (xviii, 21-2) confirms the contradiction by saying that Śāṅkhāna was son of Vajranābha as the Puranas state.

Further, the Rāmāyāna makes Kakutstha son of Bhagīratha and grandson of Dilipa, but the Puranas say he was son of Śāśāda, and was the third earliest king. The Mahābhārata corroborates them,<sup>10</sup>

<sup>1</sup> MBh iii, 129, 10514; vii, 64, 2303-18; xii, 29, 993-7. There was another Ambarīṣa, son of Manu's son Nābhāga (see infra), but the Ambarīṣa extolled in MBh was apparently the Ayodhyā king.

<sup>6</sup> Raghuv iii, 13-21. Not every archaeological statement in the Raghuv is correct, for it refers to Puspapura (i. e. Pāṭaliputra) as existing (vi, 24) in Aja's time; and speaks of the Śurasena king as a Nīpa (vi, 45-6), whereas the 'Śurasena' kingdom did not apparently exist then, and its king could hardly have been a Nīpa (see S. Pañcāla).

and the Raghuvamśa supports them in saying (vi, 71-4) that from his time the kings had borne the title Kākutstha and that Dilipa was his descendant. The Rāmāyaṇa and the Puranas have a group of five kings, Sudarśana, Agnivarṇa, Śīghra, Maru and Prasuśruta, and the Rāmāyaṇa makes them anterior to Rāma, while the Puranas put them long after him. Similarly it places three others, Śaṅkhāṇa, Dhruvasandhi and Susandhi, before Rāma, while the Puranas make them his descendants. As regards these last three and Sudarśana and Agnivarṇa the Raghuvamśa<sup>1</sup> corroborates the Puranas that they were long after Rāma, and so also as regards the three others in that it does not notice them, because it closes its account with Agnivarṇa and they succeeded him.

It thus appears that wherever it is possible to check the Rāmāyaṇa and Puranic lists of the Ayodhyā dynasty by other authorities those authorities corroborate the Puranas and contradict the Rāmāyaṇa. Hence the Rāmāyaṇa genealogy must be put aside as erroneous, and the Puranic genealogy accepted. This is not surprising, because the Rāmāyaṇa is a brahmanical poem, and the brahmans notoriously lacked the historical sense.

The Purana lists all agree fairly down to Māndhāṭṛ, though with much variation in some names; and here the Mahābhārata list also agrees. With Māndhāṭṛ there is some variation. He had three well-known sons, Purukutsa, Ambarīṣa and Mucukunda.<sup>2</sup> From Ambarīṣa came the Hārita brahmans (chapter XXIII). Mucukunda was a famous king,<sup>3</sup> and of him the fable is told that he went to sleep in a cave and slept on till awakened by Kālayavana, who had pursued Kṛṣṇa into it; then he killed Kāla, and marvelled at the degeneracy of mankind.<sup>4</sup> Purukutsa's son was Trasadasyu<sup>5</sup> who continued the main line. All then fairly agree, subject to some omissions, down to Saudāsa Kalmāṣapāda, but between him and Dilipa II Khaṭvāṅga<sup>6</sup> two different versions occur, where the names are all different: thus the Brahma, Harivamśa, Matsya, Padma, Śiva and Agni generally insert five kings, Sarvakarman, Anaranya,

Nighna, Anamitra with a Raghu, and Duliduha; but the seven other Puranas name six, Aśmaka, Mūlaka, Śataratha, Idavīda (with variations), Vṛddhaśarman and Viśvasaha. It is not material which version we adopt, because their number is practically the same and none were important, but the latter group is supported by the better texts and is preferable.<sup>1</sup> From Dilipa II Khatvāṅga to Daśaratha there is general agreement subject to some divergences; and here the better texts make Dirghabāhu 'father of Raghu' instead of an epithet of Raghu, though the Raghuvamśa omits him. From Daśaratha to Ahīnagu there is general agreement.

After Ahīnagu most of the Puranas give a list of some twenty kings Pāripātra (or Sudhanvan) to Bṛhadbala who was killed by Abhimanyu in the Bhārata battle,<sup>2</sup> agreeing generally in their names, though some of the lists are incomplete towards the end. Thus the Brahma stops at Nala (= Śāṅkhaṇa); the Harivamśa at Maru except that it mentions the last king Bṛhadbala; and the Garuḍa at Prasuśruta, where by the loss of some verses closing this dynasty and introducing the Videha line it runs the two together making Prasuśruta father of Udāvasu of that line. But six Puranas, the Matsya, Padma, Liṅga, Kūrma, Śiva and Agni, differ completely, and all except the Śiva name, instead of those twenty, six other kings, Sahasrāśva, Candrāvaloka, Tārāpīḍa, Candragiri, Bhānuścandra (with variations) and Śrutāyus. The Śiva names only the first. The Liṅga identifies Śrutāyus with Bṛhadbala, the last in the former list. The former list is certainly preferable for several reasons. The table of royal genealogies (chapter XII) shows that there must have been many more kings than six and quite as many as twenty. The Raghuvamśa corroborates it as far as Agnivarna. Some of the kings in the long list are named elsewhere, and even in the Matsya which gives the short list; thus, it mentions Hiranyanābhin Kausalya as teacher of king Kṛta of Dvīmīḍha's line,<sup>3</sup> and Maru as one who with Devāpi the Paurava will restore the ksatriyas at the end of this Kali age.<sup>4</sup> Further Pāripātra and his successors appear from a comparison of their names to be meant by the Mahābhārata story of Parikṣit and his sons.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand there is nothing, as far as I know, to support the short list. The longer list of twenty kings must therefore be accepted.

The Videha Dynasty.

This dynasty was descended from Ikṣvāku's son Nimi (or Nemi)<sup>2</sup> who is called Videha,<sup>3</sup> and so was a branch of the Solar race.<sup>4</sup> It is given by five Puranas, and its early part down to Siradhvaja by the Rāmāyana.<sup>5</sup> All are in substantial agreement down to Siradhvaja, except that the Garuḍa, as mentioned above, omits the first two kings and makes Udāvasu of this dynasty son of Prasuśruta of Ayodhyā. The Puranas fairly agree about the rest of the genealogy, except that after Śakuni the Viṣṇu, Garuḍa and Bhāgavata insert twelve kings, Añjana to Upagupta, whom the Vāyu and Brahmanāḍa omit. No doubt these three Puranas are right and the two latter have lost this portion, because the table of genealogies, with the synchronisms, shows that there must have been many more kings than the Vāyu and Brahmanāḍa have.

Kuśadhvaja was Siradhvaja's brother and was king of Sāṅkāśyā, as the Puranas generally say and also the Rāmāyana.<sup>6</sup> The Bhāgavata confuses the genealogy here, and gives Kuśadhvaja's successors thus. Its account is supported by the Viṣṇu in a story about Keśidhvaja and Khāṇḍikya,<sup>7</sup> and may be true.

<sup>6</sup> Rām i, 70, 2–3; 71, 14–16, 19. Bd iii, 64, 18–19 and Vā 89, 18 invert two lines and corrupt Sāṅkāśyā; they should read thus:—

bhrātā Kuśadhvajas tasya Sāṅkāśyādhipatir nṛpah

From the second king Mithi Janaka (whom the Rāmāyaṇa makes two) it is said the capital Mithilā was named,<sup>1</sup> and hence the kings were called Maithilas.<sup>2</sup> From him, too, the kings were also styled Janaka, and this was the family name, for he was the first king Janaka,<sup>3</sup> and the Janakas are expressly mentioned as a family,<sup>4</sup> and two Puranas conclude with the remark that with Kṛti ends the race of the Janakas.<sup>5</sup> The kings were thus collectively 'Janakas', and many are individually so named, as Sīradhvaja,<sup>6</sup> Dharmadhvaja,<sup>7</sup> Janadeva,<sup>8</sup> Daivarāti,<sup>9</sup> Khāṇḍikya,<sup>10</sup> and also Karāla<sup>11</sup> and Aindradyumni<sup>12</sup> (who are not named in the genealogy).<sup>13</sup> The references to 'Janaka' in the brahmanical books do not therefore necessarily mean one and the same king, but the name is used generically there<sup>14</sup> according to the brahmanical custom and lack of the historical sense, just as various Vasiṣṭhas and Viśvāmitras are mentioned merely as Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra, and are sometimes confused as one Vasiṣṭha and one Viśvāmitra. Moreover, the brahmanical Bhāgavata says of these Maithilas generally that they were skilled in knowledge of the Ātman,<sup>15</sup> so that it is erroneous to assume that only one Janaka is meant in the brahmanical books.

Mahābhārata.<sup>1</sup> None of these works however carries the genealogy beyond Pramati or Sumati, who was the contemporary of Daśaratha, king of Ayodhyā, according to the Rāmāyaṇa.<sup>2</sup> Only four lists are complete, those in the Vāyu, Viṣṇu, Garuḍa and Bhāgavata. The others show various limitations or omissions: thus the Liṅga mentions only the first four kings; the Mahābhārata list is incomplete at the beginning, goes down only to Marutta, and wrongly inserts an Ikṣvāku; the Brahmandā omits from Prajāṇi to Avikṣit, though Marutta was well known as son of Avikṣit;<sup>3</sup> the Mārkanḍeya narrates the doings of these kings at great length but only down to Rājyavardhana; and the Rāmāyaṇa begins the dynasty with Viśāla, wrongly calling him 'son of Ikṣvāku'. Subject to these shortcomings the lists are in substantial agreement.

No name is given to this dynasty or kingdom at first, but king Viśāla is said to have founded Viśāla or Vaiśāli as his capital, and thenceforward the kingdom was that of Vaiśāli, and the kings were styled Vaiśālaka kings.<sup>4</sup> These names may conveniently be extended retrospectively to include the whole dynasty. The first two kings named are Bhalandana and Vatsapri. Bhalandana is said to have become a vaiśya,<sup>5</sup> and it is declared there were three vaiśya hymn-makers, Bhalandana, Vatsa or Vāśasva (read Vatsapri?) and Sankila.<sup>6</sup> This Vatsapri Bhalandana is the reputed author of Rigveda ix, 68, and probably x, 45 and 46. Accordingly some Puranas add that these vaiśyas became brahmans.<sup>7</sup>

The Śāryātās.

These were the descendants of Śāryāti, son of Manu, and the list is given briefly by twelve Puranas.<sup>8</sup> There is a fair amount of agreement. The dynasty does not play any conspicuous part in tradition, and the genealogy is manifestly curtailed and incomplete. It may be stated thus—Śaryāti, his son Ānarta and daughter Sukanyā (who married the great Bhārgava rishi Cyavana), then Rocamāna, Reva and Raivata Kakudmin. It reigned at Kuśasthalī, the ancient name of Dvārakā (Dvāravatī)<sup>1</sup> in Gujarat, which was named Ānarta after king Ānarta. It did not last long and was destroyed by Puṇyajana Rākṣasas. The remnant of the Śāryātas appear to have afterwards become a tribe among the Haihayas (see next chapter).

Raivata is made the subject of myth in that it is said he visited the Gandharva world and Brahmā's court, stayed there listening to music for long ages, returned to find Kuśasthalī in possession of the Yādavas and then gave his daughter to Balarāma.<sup>2</sup> It seems probable that two Raivatas, who were ages apart, have been confused.

The Nābhāgas.

These were the descendants of Manu's son Nābhāga, and their genealogy is noticed in twelve Puranas.<sup>3</sup> All mention Nābhāga or Nābhāga and his son Ambarīṣa,<sup>4</sup> and the Brahmāṇḍa, Vāyu, Viṣṇu, Garuḍa and Bhāgavata add the successors, Virūpa, Pṛṣadaśva and Rathitara. Where this dynasty reigned is wholly uncertain. From Rathitara were descended the Rathitaras who were 'kṣatriyan brahmans' as will be noticed in chapter XXIII.

CHAPTER IX

THE AILA OR LUNAR RACE

THIS stock gave rise, as mentioned in chapter VII, to two side branches, the Kānyakubja and Kāśi dynasties, and developed through Yayāti's five sons into five races. The genealogies of all these will now be considered in detail.

The Kānyakubja Dynasty.

Two origins are alleged for the Kānyakubja dynasty. It was descended from Purūravas' son Amāvasu according to seven Puranas,<sup>1</sup> which give the first kings as Amāvasu, Bhīma, Kāñcanaprabha, Suhotra and Jahnu. The genealogy is also given by the Rāmāyāna, Agni and twice by the Mahābhārata.<sup>2</sup> The first Mahābhārata account and that in the Rāmāyāna leave the origin untouched, but the second account and the Agni derive Jahnu from the Paurava line, making him son of Ajamīḍha; and the Brahma and Harivamśa<sup>3</sup> inconsistently give both versions. From Jahnu to Kuśa all the lists agree,<sup>4</sup> there is variation as regards Kuśa's sons, and from Gādhi to Viśvāmitra and the end all agree generally.

The derivation from Ajamīḍha is certainly wrong. He was the seventh successor of Bharata. Viśvāmitra was the descendant of Jahnu by some eight steps, and must, if Jahnu was son of Ajamīḍha, have been some fifteen generations below Bharata; but it is well known that Bharata was son of king Duṣyanta and Śakuntalā<sup>5</sup> who was daughter of a Viśvāmitra;<sup>6</sup> so that Viśvāmitra was an ancestor of Bharata. Viśvāmitra cannot have been both an ancestor and a descendant of Bharata. The story of Śakuntalā is one of the best alleged tales in ancient tradition, so that Viśvāmitra was certainly prior to Bharata and therefore to Ajamīdha, and the versions which make his ancestor Jahnu son of Ajamīdha are certainly wrong. Moreover it will be seen from the discussion of Jahnu, Viśvāmitra and their contemporaries in chapter XIII, that they belonged to the age of the early Aikṣvāku, Haihaya and Paurava kings, long anterior to Bharata and Ajamīdha. The error appears also from the condition, that it makes this kingdom arise at the same time as N. and S. Pañcāla, though they comprised all its territory.

The error probably arose out of Rīgveda iii, 53, 12, which, referring to king Sudās, says 'this prayer of Viśvāmitra safeguards the Bhārata folk'; and Aitareya Brāhmaṇa vii, 3, 5 and Śāṅkhā-yana Śrauta Sūtra xv, 25, where Viśvāmitra is called Bharatu-ṛṣabha, 'leader of the Bharatas'. Sudās, or Sudāsa as he is called in the genealogy, was a king of the North Pañcāla dynasty, which was descended from Ajamīdha and Bharata.<sup>1</sup> He and his dynasty were therefore Bharatas or Bhāratas, for the name Pañcāla (p. 75) had not come into approved use then.<sup>2</sup> One of Viśvāmitra's descendants, called by his gotra name merely Viśvāmitra, was his priest, as the hymn shows, and therefore the religious guardian and leader of these Bharatas or Bhāratas. Afterwards misunderstanding began. That Viśvāmitra might, not inappropriately, be styled a Bharata-ṛṣabha, the term used in the Brāhmaṇa and Sūtra. These books however, through the brahmanical lack of the historical sense, confused him with his ancestor, the first Viśvāmitra, and applied this term to the first Viśvāmitra. It thus became wholly erroneous as mentioned above, and the Bharatas did not come into existence till after his time. Further, this term might be taken to imply that he was himself a Bhārata, and, as the brahmans were not learned in kṣatriya genealogies, or perhaps considered the above allusions as authoritative, it was so understood, with the result that Viśvāmitra was held to be a descendant of Bharata.<sup>3</sup> Consequently it was necessary to introduce him and his well-known ancestor Jahnu into the Paurava genealogy somewhere after Bharata; and, as Ajamīdha had three sons who ruled the separate kingdoms of Hastināpura and

North and South Pañcāla, it was easy to assign Jahnu of the Kānyakubja kingdom<sup>1</sup> as another son to him, especially as Jahnu and Ajamīḍha had near ancestors named Suhotra. Connected with this mistake is the alteration which the Brahma and Harivāṁśa make in the ancestral name Paurorava (i.e. Paurūrava) applied rightly to Viśvāmitra in the Vāyu, namely, changing it to Paurava.<sup>2</sup>

Kāśi Dynasty.

Two origins are alleged for the Kāśi (Benares) dynasty also. It was descended from Ayu's son Kṣatravṛddha according to seven Puranas,<sup>3</sup> which give the first four kings as Kṣatravṛddha, Sunahotra (or Suhotra), Kāśa (or Kāśya) and Dīrghatapas. But the Brahma and Harivāṁśa give another account also, identifying Sunahotra or Suhotra with Suhotra of the Paurava line, whom they place as son of Vitatha (really son of Bṛhatkṣatra and great-grandson of Vitatha), and so, deriving this dynasty from Suhotra Paurava, give the early kings thus—Vitatha, Suhotra, Kāśika and Dīrghatapas. They thus inconsistently give both origins for the dynasty. The Agni follows this version, though confusedly and faultily.<sup>4</sup> Both versions agree on the whole in their lists of the kings, except that the second has various omissions. The list is not a long one and reaches down only to king Bharga, but at what stage in the chronology he is to be placed is wholly uncertain. The kings in the Pāṇḍavas' time were Subāhu and Abhibhū.<sup>5</sup>

The former version is clearly right and the latter is wrong, because Divodāsa and Pratardana of this dynasty, as will be seen from the discussion about the synchronisms in chapter XIII, were contemporaries of the Haihaya kings and lived anterior to Vitatha and Suhotra of the Paurava line. The origin of the error here is not so easily conjecturable as of that in the Kānyakubja genealogy, yet it appears to have arisen from confusing Kṣatravṛddha and his successor Sunahotra or Suhotra here with Bṛhatkṣatra and his successor Suhotra of the Paurava dynasty.

The Haihayas.

The genealogy of the Haihaya branch of the Yādavas is given by twelve Puranas.<sup>1</sup> They all agree generally, except that there are differences and some uncertainty in the account of Tālajaṅgha's offspring, and there the best texts collated say this—Tālajaṅgha had many sons, called the Tālajaṅghas, of whom the eldest was king Vītihotra: the Haihayas comprised five families, the Vītihotras, Śāryātas,<sup>2</sup> Bhojas, Avantis and Tūṇdikeras, who were all Tālajaṅghas:<sup>3</sup> Vītihotra's son was king Ananta, and his son was Durjaya Amitrakarśana. The Brahma and Harivāṁśa give, instead of the last two lines, six other lines,<sup>4</sup> but these seem doubtful inasmuch as they assign to this branch persons and families who apparently belonged to the other branch.

The Yādavas.

The genealogy of the other branch descended from Yadu's son Kroṣṭu and known as the Yādavas proper may be conveniently noticed in two parts, the first from Kroṣṭu to Sātvata and the second the remainder.

The first part is given by twelve Puranas.<sup>5</sup> They all agree generally, though with considerable variations in some of the names, down to Parāvṛt's sons. Then they leave the further descent of the senior line from his eldest son, and follow the line of his younger son Jyāmagha, who (or whose son Vidarbha) carved out the kingdom of Vidarbha. This line soon divided into three sub-lines, the senior of which apparently continued there for a time, while the second descended from Kaiśika (who is often miscalled Kauśika) established itself in Cedi, and the third from Lomapāda reigned elsewhere. All the authorities agree in the main about these developments, and the Kūrma (i, 24, 6-10) gives Lomapāda's sub-line for thirteen descents. The genealogies then follow the senior line of Vidarbha from Kratha, whom the Brahma and Harivaiśa call Bhīma,<sup>1</sup> and all are in general agreement down to Devakṣatra, though with variations in some of the names. Then occur differences down to Sātvata, and the texts collated suggest the names set out in the Table of genealogies in chapter XII.

Lomapāda's sub-line is given thus—Lomapāda, Babhru, Āhṛti,<sup>2</sup> Śveta, Viśvasaha, Kauśika, Sumanta, Anala, Śveni, Dyutimant, Vapuṣmant, Br̥hanmedhas, Śrīdeva, and Vītaratha. Where they reigned is not stated.

The second part begins with Sātvata's sons. Bhajamāna, Devā-vṛdha, Andhaka and Vṛṣṇi<sup>3</sup> and comprises the various families that developed from them. It is given by the same twelve Puranas, but the accounts are not all clear, for several reasons. Some of the pedigrees have become confused in some Puranas through mistakes in names, partly at least due to misreadings of old scripts; as where the Brahmāṇḍa and Vāyu misread Andhakāt as Satyakāt in giving Andhaka's descendants; and the Brahma and Harivaiśa misread Vṛṣṇer as Kroṣṭor in giving Vṛṣṇi's descendants, and then seemingly regard him as Yadu's son Kroṣṭu, so mentioning some of the lines of descent twice. Moreover some passages seem to have become misarranged, and lines have sometimes been lost. Some uncertainty was caused by the fact that there were several persons with the same names in these families, and thus it seems that Vṛṣṇi's eldest son by one wife was Sumitra known also as Anamitra, and his youngest son by another wife was Anamitra too; while Vṛṣṇi was a favourite name. The difficulties can only be cleared up by collating the various passages in those Puranas, which are based on the same original metrical text more or less accurately.<sup>1</sup> That being done, the results are shown in the pedigrees set out infra.

There is no difficulty about Bhajamāna, for only his sons are mentioned, and the texts, though partially corrupt, yet when collated make the account clear.<sup>2</sup>

Nor is there any difficulty about Devāvṛdha, because only his son Babhru is named, and the texts<sup>3</sup> collated say his lineage were the Bhojas of Mārttikāvata as stated in the concluding half verse.<sup>4</sup>

The real difficulties occur with regard to Andhaka's and Vṛṣṇi's descendants, and these are elucidated in detail.

Andhaka had four sons, but only two are important, Kukura and Bhajamāna. From Kukura were descended the Kukuras,<sup>5</sup> and Bhajamāna's descendants were specially styled the Andhakas.<sup>6</sup> The genealogy of both as elucidated by collating the texts is given in the table opposite.

Vṛṣṇi's progeny present the most difficulty, because he had at least four sons, two with the same name, and from them were descended various families, and because the accounts are not always compact.

<sup>1</sup> Viṣ iv, 13, 1 f. Ag 274, 24 f. Gar i, 139, 36 f., and Bhāg ix, 24, 6 f. have recast the account and show much confusion, especially the last three, but are useful for comparison.

The Yādavas—The Sātvatas.

Moreover the Brahma, Harivamśa and Padma misread his name as Kroṣṭu or Kroṣṭr, and appear to confuse him with his ancestor, Yadu's son Kroṣṭu or Kroṣṭr, and that this is a mistake is shown by their reading Vṛṣṇi correctly in the first line about the family of the Śainyas.<sup>1</sup> There were three lines of descent of the Vṛṣṇis from Vṛṣṇi's three sons Anamitra, Yudhājit and Devamīḍhuṣa;<sup>2</sup> and Anamitra there means the eldest son (by Gāndhārī), who was also called Sumitra. But there was also a fourth line from his youngest son Anamitra (by Mādrī) as will appear, whose descendants were called Śainyas. Vṛṣṇi's lineage, so far as it can be made out from a collation of the important texts, is shown in the next table, and a comparison of its length with that of the Kukuras and Andhakas shows that it must omit several generations.

Vṛṣṇi's offspring begin with that of the eldest son (by Gāndhārī) Sumitra, called Anamitra by the Brahma and Harivamśa, down to Satrajit,<sup>1</sup> and Satrajit's children are mentioned separately.<sup>2</sup> Yudhājit's descendants divided into two families, those of Śvaphalka and Citraka.<sup>3</sup> Devamīḍhuṣa's line is given extremely briefly, and some of the authorities wrongly invert him and his son Sūra.<sup>4</sup> This was the family in which Kṛṣṇa was born.<sup>5</sup> Viṣṇu's youngest son Anamitra had a son Śini, and their descendants were called the Śainyas.<sup>6</sup> All these are shown in the table opposite.

MBh xiii, 147, 6834-5 says Sūra was son (descendant) of Citraratha, referring to his distant ancestor. Kūr i, 24, 67-70 confusedly joins this line on to Hṛdika in the Andhaka line. Cf. The Yādavas (Sūtravās) continued—The Vṛṣṇis.

Druhyus, and the Viṣṇu, Garuḍa and Bhāgavata omit the last part. Marutta the great king of this dynasty (whom the Matsya incorrectly calls Bharata) had no son and adopted Duṣyanta the Paurava, and thus this line is said to have merged into the Paurava line, as the Brahmanḍa, Vāyu, Brahma and Harivamśa declare. Yet it is added that from this line or from Duṣyanta there was a branch which founded the kingdoms of Pāṇḍya, Cola, Kerala, &c. in the south.<sup>1</sup> The line stands thus, greatly abbreviated—Turvasu, Vahni, Garbha, Gobhānu, Trisānu, Karandhama, Marutta, Duṣyanta, Śarūtha (or Varūtha), Aṇḍira; and Pāṇḍya, Kerala, Cola and Kulya (or Kola).

Druhyu's line is given by nine Puranas,<sup>2</sup> and all are in general agreement, except that the Brahma and Harivamśa wrongly divide it into two, assigning to him the successors down to Gāndhāra, and Dharma and the remainder to Anu. This mistake of theirs is the cause or result of their erroneously making the Ānavas a branch growing out of the Paurava line, as will be explained in noticing the Ānava genealogy. The line stands thus—Druhyu with two sons Babhu and Setu, then Setu's descendants, Aṅgāra-setu,<sup>3</sup> Gāndhāra, Dharma, Dhṛta,<sup>4</sup> Durdama,<sup>5</sup> Pracetasa, to whom the Brahma and Harivamśa add Sucetas. Four Puranas add that Pracetasa's offspring spread out into the mleccha countries to the north beyond India and founded kingdoms there.<sup>6</sup>

The Ānavas.

The genealogy of Anu's descendants, the Ānavas, is given by nine Puranas.<sup>7</sup> All agree substantially, except that the Brahma and Harivamśa wrongly make Anu's lineage descend from Kakṣeyu, one of the sons of Raudrāśva of the Paurava line, and wrongly assign to Anu part of Druhyu's progeny,<sup>1</sup> as mentioned above. The seventh king after Anu, Mahāmanas, had two sons, Uśinara and Titikṣu, and under them the Ānavas divided into two great branches; Uśinara and his descendants occupied the Panjab, and Titikṣu founded a new kingdom in the east, viz., in East Behar.

Uśinara's posterity is given by the same nine Puranas,<sup>2</sup> the fullest account being in the Brahmānda, Vāyu, Brahma and Harivamśa. It stands thus, with the kingdoms that his descendants founded:—

Titikṣu's lineage is given by the same nine Puranas.<sup>5</sup> All agree substantially, except that the Brahmānda has lost all after Dharmaratha in a great lacuna, the Vāyu omits from Satyaratha to Campa, the Viṣṇu, Garuḍa and Bhāgavata omit Jayadratha's descendants, and the Brahma and Agni omit Vijaya and his line. The best accounts are in the Matsya and Harivamśa. This 'Kingdom in the East' was divided among Bali's five sons into five kingdoms, Āṅga, Vāṅga, Kaliṅga, Puṇḍra and Suhma. He was quite distinct from Bali son of Virocana, the Daitya (p. 64). This genealogy with the Āṅga line is given in the Table in chapter XII.

The Pauravas.

The genealogy of Pūru's descendants, the Pauravas, is found in eight Puranas and also twice in the Mahābhārata, and may be conveniently considered in three portions, only the more important features and differences being noticed ; the first, from Pūru to Ajamīdha, the second from Ajamīdha to Kuru, and the third from Kuru to the Pāṇḍavas. The Brahmanḍa has lost all the Pauravas in a large lacuna.

In the first portion all the Puranas<sup>1</sup> agree more or less down to Matināra ; but the two Mahābhārata accounts<sup>2</sup> differ, the first having many names as in the Puranas but being manifestly confused ;<sup>3</sup> and the second omitting Raudrāśva and Rceyu, but inserting a group of ten kings Sārvabhauma, Jayatsena, Avācīna, Ariha, Mahābhauma, Ayutanāyin, Akrodhana, Devātithi, Ariha and Rkṣa between Ahamyāti and Matināra. None of the other authorities know of this group in this position, and all the Puranas place it as a group of eight kings in the third portion between Vidūratha and Bhimasena, except the Brahma, Harivāṁśa and Agni which omit all these kings except Rkṣa (who is Rkṣa II). The Mahābhārata has certainly misplaced this group, and for several reasons. Its own first account agrees with the Puranas in knowing nothing of this group here. The account says that two of these kings married princesses of Aṅga, one a princess of Kaliṅga, and two married princesses of Vidarbha, but those kingdoms were not founded till long after Matināra's time, as will appear from the synchronisms in chapter XIII and Table of genealogies in chapter XII. That table and the synchronisms also show that it is impossible these ten kings could find room at this stage ; and further that, if they could be inserted here, there would be an unaccountable gap in the third portion. The group must therefore be removed from here and put where the Puranas place it, in the third portion, and where it is thoroughly in position.

<sup>3</sup> It says Pūru's son Pravīra married a Saurasena princess (3696), and his son Manasyu married a Sauvīra princess (3697), but Śurasena and Sauvīra did not come into existence till later ; see chap. XIV and Anavas ante.

From Tānsu to Duṣyanta there is great uncertainty. The chief texts, the Vāyu, Matsya, Brahma and Harivamśa, have a certain seeming agreement, yet really supply no intelligible pedigree, as will appear if we try to construct one from their statements. All that seems clear is that there was a remarkable woman Ilinā and that her grandson was Duṣyanta.<sup>1</sup> The Mahābhārata accounts turn her into a king Iliua. Queens were sometimes turned into kings mistakenly,<sup>2</sup> but I am not aware of any instance of the reverse; so that these accounts appear to be incorrect, and the genealogical verse quoted is not found in these Puranas. The other Puranas which are later have connected up a pedigree, but differ incomparably and omit Ilinā altogether. The truth is, there is a serious gap in the genealogy here, as will appear from the discussion of the synchronisms in chapter XIII.

From Duṣyanta to Hastin (or Bṛhat<sup>3</sup>), who founded or named Hastināpura, the lists fairly agree. Hastin had two sons Ajamīḍha and Dvimiḍha. Ajamīḍha continued the main Paurava line at Hastināpura, and Dvimiḍha founded a separate dynasty, which is not specially named and may be called the Dvimiḍha line, and which will be noticed infra. This portion is shown in the following table.

The second portion from Ajamīḍha to Kuru is given by the same eight Puranas<sup>4</sup> and the two Mahābhārata accounts.<sup>5</sup> Ajamīḍha had three sons, and they originated separate dynasties. The eldest line from Rkṣa I continued the main line at Hastināpura, and here the lists agree down to Kuru, inserting only Saṁvaraṇa between them; but it will appear from the synchronisms and the Table of genealogies in chapters XIV and XII that there must have been more generations, and that not a few names have been lost here, probably both before and after Rkṣa. The two other sons, Nila and Bṛhadvasu,<sup>1</sup> founded the dynasties of North and South Pañcāla respectively, which will be noticed separately. The Mahābhārata does not say anything about the origin of these two dynasties, except that its first account baldly declares that Ajamīḍha had two sons Duṣyanta and Parameṣṭhin, and from them came all the Pañcālas, which except in the names agrees with the Puranas. South Pañcāla was approximately the portion of Pañcāla south of the Ganges as far as the R. Carmanvatī (Chambal), and its capitals were Kāmpilya<sup>2</sup> and Mākandī. North Pañcāla was the portion north of the Ganges, with its capital at Ahicchattrā,<sup>3</sup> whence it was called the Ahicchattrā country.<sup>4</sup>

Bharata's descendants were called the Bharatas or Bhāratas;<sup>5</sup> so all these dynasties, the main line at Hastināpura<sup>6</sup> and those of the Dvīmīḍhas and of North<sup>7</sup> and South Pañcāla, were Bhāratas.

The third portion from Kuru to the Pāṇḍavas is given by the same authorities.<sup>8</sup> There are some discrepancies among Kuru's immediate descendants, but the text suggested by collating the chief accounts<sup>9</sup> clears them up. It shows that Kuru had three sons, Parikṣit I<sup>1</sup> the eldest, Jahnu and Sudhanvan. The account deals first with Sudhanvan's descendants, an offshoot, in which was Vasu who conquered and founded anew the kingdoms of Cedi and Magadha : its genealogy is noticed separately infra. The account then returns to the main line, to Parikṣit I's lineage. His son was Janamejaya II, and his sons were Śrutasesa, Ugrasesa and Bhīmasesa. Then the account drops them, passes to Jahnu, and gives his descendants who became the main Paurava line.<sup>2</sup> Śrutasesa, Ugrasesa and Bhīmasena are not described as kings, and the fact that their line stops and the account passes to Jahnu's son Suratha as king shows that Janamejaya's branch lost the sovereignty, which then vested in Suratha. The cause of this is explained by a story told earlier in the genealogy. Janamejaya II injured the rishi Gārgya's son and was cursed by Gārgya ; he was abandoned by his people, and was in great affliction ; he sought help from the rishi Īndrota Daivāpa Śāunaka, who purified him with a horse-sacrifice.<sup>3</sup> He did not however recover the sovereignty, and so his three sons passed into oblivion.<sup>4</sup>

The Mahābhārata's two genealogies of the main line are different and mutually inconsistent, though if the group of kings, Sārvabhauma to Rkṣa II, be brought from the first portion into its proper place here, the second genealogy approximates to the Purana

<sup>2</sup> Viṣ, Gar and Ag agree with this résumé, except that Viṣ and Gar (unless its reading be amended) make Janamejaya's three sons his brothers. Bhāg says Parikṣit I had no offspring. Ag follows Hv with one or two more mistakes. MBh i, 3, 661-2 and Bhāg ix, 22, 35 confuse this Janamejaya II with the later Parikṣit's son Janamejaya III, who reigned after the Bhārata battle ; and then make the same mistake as Viṣ and Gar. Var 193, 1-5 also confuses them. The Parikṣit who got Vāmadeva's horses was a different person, a king of Ayodhyā (MBh iii, 192, 13145, 13179 f.), and probably the same as Pāripātra of that line.

<sup>4</sup> This explains the allusions in the Śatapatha Brāhm (xiii, 5, 4, 1) and Śāṅkhāyana Śr Sūtra (xvi, 9, 7) to Janamejaya Pārikṣita and his three sons (not brothers), the Pārikṣitiyas, and also the question in the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad (iii, 3), 'Whither have the Pārikṣitas gone ?' if their extinction be implied : but the answer 'Thither where aśvamedha sacrifices go' suggests the opposite, because such sacrifices procured great blessings, as is declared in this story in MBh xii, 152, 5674. account. The Brahma, Harivamśa and Agni omit them all except Rkṣa II.

The Dvimidhas.

The Dvimidha dynasty is given by six Puranas.<sup>1</sup> It is derived correctly by the Vāyu, Viṣṇu, Garuḍa and Bhāgavata, but is wrongly attributed to Ajamidha by the Matsya and Harivamśa; and the Viṣṇu by the loss of words, that closed the South Pañcāla dynasty with Bhallāṭa's son Janamejaya and opened this, says Dvimidha was Bhallāṭa's son and thus tacks it on to that line. This is clearly wrong, because it thus makes Ugrāyudha of this dynasty the tenth descendant from Bhallāṭa, but he killed Bhallāṭa's son Janamejaya, and both of them were contemporaries of Bhīṣma, as will be explained in chapter XIII.<sup>2</sup> As regards the kings the lists agree generally (the Vāyu and Matsya having the best texts), with however some mistakes. Thus the Viṣṇu, Garuḍa and Bhāgavata omit four kings, Sudharman to Rukmaratha; and the Bhāgavata, misunderstanding the relation of teacher and disciple between Hiranyanābha of Kosala and king Kṛta,<sup>3</sup> wrongly introduces the former here as Kṛta's father, and also wrongly assigns the last five kings as Nipa's descendants in the South Pañcāla line. The Vāyu, Matsya and Harivamśa declare that in Sārvabhauma's lineage was Mahant Paurava, thus indicating a gap between them. This line is set out in the Table of Genealogies in chapter XII.

North Pañcāla.

This dynasty, which reigned in the portion of Pañcāla north of the Ganges, is given by eight Puranas.<sup>4</sup> All are in substantial agreement (except that the Brahma is incomplete) down to Divodās'a son Mitrayu. Then divergencies occur as regards Mitrayu's son and Śrījaya and Cyavana-Pañcajana, and the Brahma, Harivamśa and Agni call Sudāsa Somadatta. After that all agree. This is a very noteworthy dynasty, because many of its kings play an important part in the Rigveda. Pañcajana appears to be a mistake for the Vedic Pijavana, and Sudāsa is the Vedic Sudās.<sup>1</sup> It stands with its incidental information as in the preceding table.

Bhr̥myāśva's territory was apparently subdivided among his five sons as petty rājās. The eldest branch soon rose to prominence under Vadhryāśva, Divodāsa, and Sudās. It decayed after Sudās' death and was subdued by Sañvarāṇa of the main Hastināpura line.<sup>2</sup> It then became insignificant, and so there is a large gap after Jantu until Pṛṣata revived the dynasty in Bhīṣma's time. Drona with the aid of the Hastināpura princes conquered Pṛṣata's son Drupada, retained North Pañcāla for himself, and transferred him to South Pañcāla,<sup>3</sup> so that this family reigned over South Pañcāla in the period treated of in the Mahābhārata. From Srñjaya of the main branch here were descended the Srñjayas and from Somaka the Somakas, both of which families attended Drupada<sup>4</sup> who was a Somaka.<sup>5</sup> This dynasty is also noteworthy because it became brahmanic, as will be explained in chapter XXIII.

South Pañcāla.

This dynasty, which reigned south of the Ganges and was descended from Ajamīḍha as mentioned above, is given by six Puranas.<sup>6</sup> All these are in general agreement down to Nīpa except that there is much variation in the names of the first five kings. From Nīpa were descended the Nīpas. Then all agree substantially, except that the Matsya wrongly derives Nīpas chief son Samara and Samara's successors from a younger son of Senajit by a misreading of Kāryāc ca for Kāmpilye; the Bhāgavata omits most of these successors, and the Garuḍa the last three kings. The Viṣṇu omits the last king Jamamejaya and wrongly tacks the Dvimiḍha line on to this (see above).

The dynasties in these countries were descended from Kuru's son Sudhanvan (ante), and the genealogy is found in seven Puranas.<sup>1</sup> His fourth successor, Vasu, conquered the kingdom of Cedi,<sup>2</sup> which belonged to the Yādavas (ante), and obtained the title Caidyoparicara, 'the overcomer of the Caidyas'.<sup>3</sup> He also subdued and annexed the adjoining countries as far as Magadha. He had five sons, Bṛhadratha, Pratyagraha, Kuśa or Kuśāmba called Maṇivāhana, Yadu (or Lalittha), and a fifth Māvella, Māthailya or Māruta. He divided his territories and established them in separate kingdoms. They were the Vāsava kings, and occupied countries and towns named after themselves.<sup>4</sup> Cedi and Magadha were two of those kingdoms, two others from their position must have been Kauśāmbī and Karuṣa,<sup>5</sup> but the fifth is not clear.

The eldest son Bṛhadratha took Magadha and founded the famous Bāhradratha dynasty there.<sup>6</sup> Kuśa or Kuśāmba obviously had Kauśāmbī, Pratyagraha may have taken Cedi, and Yadu Karuṣa. It seems probable the fifth kingdom<sup>7</sup> was Matsya. The Matsyas existed before (probably as a Yādava tribe), because they were opponents of Sudās;<sup>8</sup> and Vasu may have conquered this country also, which adjoined Cedi on the north-west. There is no account given anywhere about the Matsya dynasty, except that fable<sup>9</sup> made Vasu the parent, through a fish, of two children, the fisher-maiden Kālī (p. 69) and a son named Matsya, who became a king. The genealogies in the Viṣṇu and Bhāgavata insert Matsya among Vasu's sons, and those in the other Puranas add Kālī and Matsya to the above five. Thus tradition suggests that one of Vasu's sons was king of Matsya, and except to account for this there was no reason for introducing him into that fable: possibly then the fifth son should be Matsya, and his kingdom Matsya.

After Vasu the genealogies give only the Magadha dynasty. All are in general agreement, subject to variations in names, except that the Brahma ends with Bṛhadratha's grandson Rṣabha, and the Viṣṇu and Bhāgavata by abbreviation make Jarāsandha Bṛhadratha's son. As regards the collateral dynasties we know only the kings who reigned in the Pāṇḍavas' time, namely, Damaghosa, his son Śiśupāla Sunrtha, and his son Dhṛṣṭaketu, kings of Cedi;<sup>1</sup> Vṛddhaśarman and his son Dantavakra, kings of Karūṣa;<sup>2</sup> Virāṭa, king of Matsya.<sup>3</sup>

CHAPTER X

GENERAL CREDIBILITY OF THE GENEALOGIES

THE question naturally arises whether credence can be attached to the foregoing royal genealogies. Kingdoms and dynasties existed, as we know even from the Vedic literature, and their genealogies must have existed and would have been preserved as long as the dynasties endured. It is incredible that the students of ancient traditional lore, who existed continuously as pointed out in chapter II, discarded or lost those famous genealogies and preserved spurious substitutes. This does not mean that spurious genealogies were never fabricated, for some were devised as will be noticed; but fictitious pedigrees presuppose genuine pedigrees, and it is absurd to suppose that fiction completely ousted truth : so that, if any one maintains that these genealogies are worthless, the burden rests on him to produce, not mere doubts and suppositions, but substantial grounds and reasons for his assertion. Common sense thus shows that these genealogies cannot be fictitious, and the foregoing question is narrowed down to this, whether they can be accepted as substantially trustworthy. Their credibility can be tested in various ways.

First, by contemporary corroboration, and here we have a signal instance in the large agreement between the genealogy of the North Pañcāla kings and the incidental references to many of them in the Rigveda.<sup>1</sup>

Mudgala (called Bhārmyaśva by the Anukramanī) is mentioned in hymn x, 102, 5, 9 ; Indrasenā<sup>2</sup> in verse 2, and Vadhryaśva may be hinted at by the words vadhriṇā yujā in verse 12. Vadhryaśva is named in x, 69, 1 f., and in vi, 61, 1, which says Divodāsa was his son. Srñjaya is mentioned in iv, 15, 4. Cyavana is probably meant in x, 69, 5, 6,<sup>3</sup> and his other name Pañcājana is no doubt a misreading of Pijavana. His son Sudāsa is named as Sudās Paijavana in vii, 18, 22, 23, and verse 25 says Sudās was son (i.e. descendant) of Divodāsa. Aitareya Brāhmaṇa vii, 34 says Sahadeva was descended from Srñjaya, and hymn iv, 15, 7-10 says Somaka was his son. Further, iii, 53, 9, 11, 12, 24 and vi, 16, 19 show that Divodāsa and Sudās were descendants of Bharata. In all these particulars the hymns agree with the genealogy, and they are too numerous and too closely interrelated to permit of any doubt that these Vedic kings were the North Pañcāla kings.

Further, references to Vadhryaśva's fire in x, 69, 2, 4, 9, 10 show that he and its reputed author, his descendant, Sumitra, exercised priestly functions ; and so also as regards Divodāsa and his fire in viii, 103, 2. Hymn i, 130, 7, 10 proves that some of the descendants of Divodāsa the warrior were rishis and brahmans ; and x, 133 is attributed to Sudās. These allusions confirm the statements in the genealogy that Mudgala's descendants were 'kṣatriyan brahmans', as will be discussed in chapter XXIII.

This is the only dynasty to which connected references occur in the Rigveda and that can be tested thereby. Those references entirely corroborate the genealogy ; and the statements in the latter show that it could not have been framed therefrom but was independent. Its genuineness, accuracy and independence prove that it must have been contemporaneous with the dynasty and as old as the hymns themselves. This conclusion affords a very strong presumption that the other genealogies are also genuine and true ; the want of evidence regarding them is wholly on the side of the Vedic literature, and its silence proves nothing adverse.

Secondly, the genealogies are corroborated by the testimony of other works in their support. Of this we have a cogent instance in the Raghuvainśa and the Ayodhyā genealogy. The Puranas give one version of that genealogy and the Rāmāyaṇa another and absolutely incompatible version as already pointed out (chap. VIII), and those Puranas and the Rāmāyaṇa were in existence when Kālidāsa composed the Raghuvamśa ; yet he followed the Puranic version in the portion of the genealogy that he gives which is common to both. Putting aside Dilipa, because the comparison from him is uncertain, since the Rāmāyaṇa names only one Dilipa while the Puranas mention two, and starting from Raghu about whom there is no doubt, he gives four kings, Raghu, Aja, Daśaratha and Rāma as in the Puranas, instead of the Rāmāyaṇa version of 14 or 15 kings ; so that he virtually declares the Puranas are right and the Rāmāyaṇa wrong. His work also testifies that the Puranic version is no late composition, but was so well established as authoritative in his time that even the Rāmāyaṇa could not invalidate it ; and proves that, as his entire list from Dilipa II down to Agnivarpa agrees substantially with the list in the Vāyu, Brahmāṇḍa, Brahma, Harivamśa and Viṣṇu, the Puranic list was the same substantially in his time as we have it now. If then the Puranic genealogy of Ayodhyā was held to be right then, in spite of the Rāmāyaṇa, that is strong evidence that it is ancient and trustworthy. It is reasonable to conclude that equal care has been bestowed on the other dynasties, and there is a strong presumption that they had been equally well preserved during the preceding centuries, that is, that they are the original genealogies and therefore genuine.

Thirdly, the existence of spurious genealogies testifies in favour of these genealogies. They are of two kinds, first, the wrong derivation of true genealogies, and secondly, wholly spurious pedigrees. Of the former kind several have been noticed in chapter IX, and the plainest instance is the derivation of the Kānyakubja dynasty from Ajamīḍha of the Paurava line, which has been demonstrated there to be wrong. Of wholly spurious genealogies there are two kinds, first the brahman vāṁśas, which will be dealt with afterwards (chapters XVI f.) and are obviously late attempts to construct vāṁśas out of the information that was available; and secondly, imaginary genealogies, such as those connected with Dakṣa and creation, and that of the various kinds of Fires.<sup>1</sup> The difference between the royal genealogies and such genealogies is most striking, revealing the distinction between what is genuine and what is a fake.

An excellent instance of a spurious genealogy is the account of the Yādavas in the Harivāṁśa (94, 5138 f.). It says Madhu, a king who reigned from Madhuvana on the river Jumna to Surāṣṭra and Ānarta (Gujarat), was descended from Yadu and Yayāti (5164). His daughter married Haryāśva, a scion of the Aikṣvāku race, and their son was Yadu, and from this Yadu were descended the Yādavas (5180, 5191). It thus makes Madhu both a Yādava and also grandfather of Yadu the ancestor of the Yādavas. It says the Yadu race thus issued from the Ikṣvāku race (5239), although it acknowledges that Madhu was already a Yādava, and introduces the further absurdity that this Yadu was like his ancestor Pūru (5176). Lastly, it styles Madhu a Daitya (5143) and a Dānava (5157),<sup>2</sup> although it acknowledges he was of the Lunar race (5165). The whole story is a mass of absurd confusion; and the confusion is carried on into the accounts of this Yadu's five sons (95, 5205 f.), except the short passage (5242-8) which appears to contain genuine tradition because it is corroborated elsewhere (see chapter XIV).

Fourthly, by the treatment of defects and mistakes. These were inevitable in the handing down of tradition, but there was a real endeavour to ascertain and preserve the genealogies correctly, because, as shown in chapter II, there were men who made a special study of ancient genealogies, and certain terms used, such as vāṁśavittama and icchānti, indicate that tradition was carefully examined and the best adopted. It was afterwards, when the brahmans obtained the custody of the Puranas, that questionable influences came into play.

Still it was difficult to make material changes which would not be inconsistent with statements elsewhere, and as they lacked the historical sense they could hardly accomplish that, and so their errors can be detected. Many instances of defects and mistakes have been noticed in the preceding chapters, and only two need be cited here as illustrations. As regards defects, there is the gap in the Paurava pedigree between Tāmsu and Dusyanta : the text in the oldest and best Puranas remains confused, and it is the later compositions that attempt to reconstruct the descent. As regards mistakes, the fact that the Rigveda, Aitareya Brāhmaṇa and Śāṅkhāyana Śrauta Sūtra connect 'Viśvāmitra' with the Bharatas in no way disturbed the best Puranas in their derivation of the Kānyakubja dynasty from Āyu's son Amāvasu ; and the derivation of it from Bharata's descendant Ajamidha was manifestly known to be doubtful, because the Brahma and Harivamśa, though they give it, give also the true version, and none of the other Puranas adopted it except the late Agni : so that mistaken post-Vedic interpretation was powerless to overthrow the kṣatriya tradition, and even the late brahmanical Bhāgavata was unmoved by it.

Fifthly, by a comparison of these with brahman genealogies. The brahmans, and the Puranic brahmans as much as other brahmans, had a natural and obvious incentive to preserve and, if necessary, to fabricate brahman genealogies. The brahmans have constituted a priestly power unique in history ; they aggrandized themselves in every way and their pretensions have been notorious ; yet, as pointed out (chapter XVI), they have produced no real brahman genealogy. If then they did not construct their own genealogies, it is absurd to suppose they fabricated elaborate kṣatriya genealogies ; and the only reasonable conclusion is that these genealogies are ancient and genuine kṣatriya tradition which was incorporated in the Purana. The internal evidence corroborates this, for these genealogies in the earliest Puranas are, on the whole, manifestly kṣatriya literature, as, for instance, the stories of Triśanku and Sagara, so often alluded to, show.

Sixthly, the genealogies declare that from time to time members of royal families became brahmans as the Kāṇvas (chapter XIX), or became kṣatriyan brahmans, many of whom developed into true brahman gotras, as will be explained in chapter XXIII. Such statements cannot have originated with the brahmans, because it was not to the interest of any brahman gotra to allege such a beginning, and it is incredible that they, deeply interested as they were in exalting their own status, would have asserted that any brahman gotra sprang from kṣatriyas, except the Viśvāmitras, whose kṣatriya ancestry was notorious; and in fact their Vedic literature says nothing about such matters. These statements were too damaging to exclusive brahmanic pretensions. The brahmans then did not put them into the genealogies. The statements came from kṣatriya sources, and were notices which occurred naturally in the course of the royal genealogies. The Puranic brahmans found these notices therein and preserved them, although Vedic brahmans ignored such facts. The statements therefore were genuine ancient tradition and were known to be true beyond gainsaying; so the Viṣṇu, a late brahmanic Purana, acknowledges them freely, and even the Bhāgavata, later still and more avowedly brahmanic, though it ignores some of them, yet admits the most important cases. The statements must have originated with the incidents they describe, and therefore the genealogies which contain them were equally ancient and contemporaneous, and these considerations show that all was preserved with care.

Seventhly, the genealogies give an account, how the Aryans dominated North India and the north-west of the Dekhan, and it is the only account to be found in the whole of Sanskrit literature of that great ethnological fact. They do not allude to that conquest except in very general terms,<sup>1</sup> yet those terms show they did know of it. They give no actual account of that, but the genealogies when co-ordinated show how the 'Aila' race extended its rule over precisely the very regions over which the Aryans established themselves. This subject will be fully dealt with hereafter (chapter XXV). This outcome was not the object of the genealogies, and they were not constructed to establish it; hence the fact that they do tacitly disclose how a great ethnological change took place is strong evidence that they are genuine and true.

Against the statements of the Puranas and Mahābhārata about matters of traditional history, arguments from Vedic literature are adduced of two kinds—arguments from statements and allusions, and arguments ex silentio. Both these have been discussed already in pages 10–12. Only a few remarks need be added here. As regards statements in that literature, contemporary references to historical matters are trustworthy, and they do not clash with kṣatriya historical tradition in the Puranas as far as I am aware; but references to prior traditional history have no such authority, though they may be of use. Arguments regarding historical matters drawn from the silence of that literature are particularly worthless. Thus it is a mistake to assert that, because the Rigveda makes no mention of the Aila (or Lunar) race, there was no such race.<sup>1</sup> One might argue with more force that, because the banyan, the most characteristic tree of India, is not mentioned in the Rigveda,<sup>2</sup> there were none in India when the hymns were composed.

These considerations show that the genealogies have strong claims to acceptance. This does not mean that they are complete and altogether accurate, because no human testimony is free from defects and errors; and it has been shown in the preceding pages, and more will appear in the following pages, that there are defects, gaps and errors in them, especially when taken singly, but many of these blemishes can be corrected by collating the various texts, and others can be remedied by statements found elsewhere. Nevertheless, it is quite clear that they are genuine accounts and are substantially trustworthy. They give us history as handed down in tradition by men whose business it was to preserve the past; and they are far superior to historical statements in the Vedic literature, composed by brahmans who lacked the historical sense and were little concerned with mundane affairs.

CHAPTER XI

CONSIDERATION OF NAMES

WHEN the genealogies are examined, differences are found in that a name or even several names appear in one or more lists while wanting in others. These variations are often unsubstantial, and may be due to faults sometimes in the MSS and sometimes in the structure of the genealogy itself. The former faults arise through copyists' mistakes or defects in the MSS. Omissions may include one or two kings, as will appear on comparing the common text of the Vāyu and Matsya in the North Pañcāla dynasty,<sup>1</sup> or a group of kings, as will appear from the common text of the Brahmanḍa and Vāyu in the Vaiśāla dynasty.<sup>2</sup> A case where a passage is in the process of disappearing occurs in the Brahma when compared with its counterpart in the Harivamśa in the North Pañcāla dynasty.<sup>3</sup> Large omissions would be due to loss of pages in the ancient MSS; and the clearest example of this is the great lacuna in the Brahmanḍa (p. 78).

Variations in the structure of a genealogy may be due to one or other of six causes, and in illustrating them it will be convenient to choose mainly from the Ayodhyā line. First, a name may be left out by mere omission, probably accidental; thus the Bhāgavata and Kūrma omit Ambarīṣa, and the Harivamśa omits Hiranyanābha, both well-known kings. Secondly, little-known kings are omitted; thus the Matsya, Padma, Liṅga and Kūrma insert after Dṛḍhāśva a king Pramoda, whom the other Puranas omit, and they and the Agni and Garuḍa omit Prasenajit, father of Yuvanāśva I, whom all the others mention. There is no good reason to think that either Pramoda or Prasenajit has been invented, and the omission is no doubt due to their unimportance. Thirdly, names have been displaced; and thus the Matsya, Padma and Agni misplace Dilipa II, Dīrghabāhu, Raghu and Aja as Raghu, Dilipa, Aja and Dīrghabāhu. Fourthly, a name has been converted into an epithet; thus most Puranas make Dīrghabāhu and Raghu father and son, and the Matsya, Padma and Agni treat them as separate, but the

Brahma, Harivamśa and Śiva treat Dirghabāhu as an epithet of Raghu, the Raghuvamśa omits him accordingly, and the Garuda mentions him, omitting Raghu. Here the weight of authority is in favour of Dirghabāhu as a separate king and not as an epithet of Raghu.<sup>1</sup> Fifthly, an epithet may conversely be turned into a king; thus the Viṣṇu, Agni and Bhāgavata give new sons for Śātvata the Yādava out of the epithets applied to his genuine sons (chapter IX); and the epithet Kausalya belonging to Hiranyanābha as king of Kosala becomes a separate king Kauśalya, his son, in the Raghuvamśa (xviii, 27). Lastly, there may be a pure blunder, as where the Matsya, Padma and Agni turn Satyavrata Trīśaṅku's wife Satyarathā into a son Satyaratha, and where the Garuḍa changes Māndhāṭī's wife Bindumatī into a son Bindumahya.

Differences occur also in names, but they are often superficial, and a few are noticed here out of the many that may be cited. Names are curtailed. Sometimes the final component is omitted, thus Kāñcanaprabha of the Kānyakubja dynasty becomes merely Kāñcana in the Viṣṇu and Garuda; Rohitāśva of the Ayodhyā line is generally called Rohita; and Bhīma Pāṇḍava's full name was Bhīmasena.<sup>2</sup> In other cases the first component is omitted, thus Devātithi of the Pauravas becomes Atithi in the Garuḍa; and the Bhāgavata calls Prasenajit of Ayodhyā Senajit.<sup>3</sup> Similarly the prefix su not seldom disappears in the later Puranas, and so Suśruta of Vṛdeha becomes Śruta in the Bhāgavata, which abounds in such modifications and also attempted emendations. Again names may be altered by misreadings, as Vasumata alias Sumati of Ayodhyā by an easy misreading of v as c or vice versa.<sup>4</sup> Further, names are changed by metathesis, thus Durdama of the Haihayas appears as Durmada in the Vāyu and Brahmāṇḍa, and the rishi Indrapramati appears as Indraprati.<sup>5</sup>

Another cause of variation, which is only superficial, is the use of synonyms. Thus Anenas, son of Āyu, appears as Vipāpman; Kṣemadhanvan of Ayodhyā as Sudhanvan in the Agni; Kalmāṣapāṇḍa of Ayodhyā as Kalmāśāṅghri;<sup>1</sup> and Hiranyakavarman, king of Daśar̄ṇa, appears as Hemavarman and Kāñcanaavarman.<sup>2</sup>

Real differences also occur in names, and many of these are easily explainable as misreadings of old scripts. A few out of many such cases may be given here, and the probable mutation is suggested, but in some instances it might have taken place reversely.

Thus misreadings of dh and v (or b) are not uncommon. Vyuṣitāśva of Ayodhyā is Dhyuṣitāśva in the Vāyu; Suvarman of Dvīmīḍha's line in the Vāyu is Sudharman in the Matsya and Harivāṁśa; and in the Videha line Pratīndhaka of the Rāmāyaṇa is Pratinvaka in the Vāyu and Pratimbaka in the Brahmāṇḍa; and the Bhāgavata by a double misreading transforms Tridhanvan of Ayodhyā into Tribandhana. Similarly Ārādhi of the Paurava line in the Vāyu is Ārāvin in the Viṣṇu; and by a further easy misreading of r as v in the later script Ārādhi becomes Āvādhīta in the Garuda, and by a second easy mistake between v and c Ārāvin appears as Avācīna in the Mahābhārata (i, 95, 3771). Some of these changes seem to be due to a desire to emend a name so as to make it intelligible.

Among easy misreadings of other letters, the following may be cited. By reading tr as v Trasadasyu of Ayodhyā (shortened probably to Trasada) was altered to Vasuda in the Matsya. By confusing r, kr, kra and ku in later mediaeval script, Rta of Videha in the Vāyu and Viṣṇu is Kṛta in some copies of the Vāyu and Kratu in the Brahmāṇḍa; Kṛteyu of the Pauravas in the Vāyu is Rteyu in the Viṣṇu and Garuḍa; and Rtuji of Videha in the Viṣṇu became, by a further easy mistake between tu and lu in later script, Kulajit in the Garuḍa. By confusion between dh and gh in the later script, we find in the Druhyu line Dharma is Gharma in the Agni and Garuḍa; and Dhṛta is Gṛta in the Matsya, Harivāṁśa and Agni, while Gṛta by a further easy misreading is Dyūta in the Brahma. Again t and j are sometimes easily mistaken in the later script, so in the Videha line Devarāta and Kirtirāta are Devarāja and Kīrtirāja in some copies of the Vāyu. P and y were easily confused, so in the Paurava line Sampāti = Samyāti of the Mahābhārata and Agni; and Ahampāti of the Viṣṇu and Bhāgavata = Ahamyāti of the Mahābhārata (i, 95, 3766-8). So also th and py, and thus in the Turvasu line Sarūtha of the Vāyu = Sarūpya of the Brahmānda. Again s and bh were sometimes rather alike, so in the Ayodhyā line Sindhudvīpa = Bhindhudvīpa of the Viṣṇu, and Prasūrūta = Prabhusuta of the Brahmānda. In the mediaeval script gu and śva might be mistaken, and so Ahīnagu of Ayodhyā becomes Ahīnāśva in the Agni. Similarly Śāṅkhaṇa of Ayodhyā (probably by metathesis, Khaśana) appears as Khagāṇa in the Bhāgavata and Gāṇa in the Garuda.

The cohesion of a euphonic r, or the treating of an initial r as belonging to the preceding word may explain in the Paurava line the forms Rahampāti of the Harivaiśa and Ahampāti of the Viṣṇu and Bhāgavatā; also of Rantināra in the Vāyu and Antināra in the Matsya, while Antināra and the form generally found, Matināra, may perhaps be due to mistake between ma and a.

Sometimes the connecting link between variant names is found readily in the Prakrit form. Ancient names do occur in both Sanskrit and Prakrit shape, for the famous Kānyakubja king appears as Gāthi and Gāthīn in the brahmanical literature<sup>1</sup> and as Gādhi in the Epics and Puranas. The examination of names in this light is an interesting study. The most cogent illustration of connexion through Prakrit is the name of the famous Paurava king, who is called Duṣyanta (with a common variation Duṣmanta)<sup>2</sup> in the Mahābhārata and Puranas, but Duṣṣanta and Duḥṣanta in brahmanic tradition because his son Bharata is styled Dauṣṣanti and Dauḥṣanti in the Aitareya and Śatapatha Brāhmaṇas respectively.<sup>3</sup> These forms can be reconciled through a Prakrit form Duṣṣanta or Dussanta, of which they are different Sanskrit equivalents, the form Duṣyanta being probably right and the brahmanic one mistaken. Similarly we have Nabhāka in Vedic literature and Nabhāga in the Puranic genealogies; and the Bhārgava rishi Apnavāna's name was 'emended' to Ātmavant (see chapter XVII). Other variant names which can be explained through Prakrit forms are the following in the Videha dynasty: Bṛhaduktha (Brahmānda and Viṣṇu) and Bṛhaduttha (Vāyu), which, by an easy misreading of dra for du, appears as Bṛhadratha in the Rāmāyaṇa : Śakuni (Vāyu and Brahmāṇḍa), through Sakuni, sa Kuni, appears as Kuni (Viṣṇu), and by an easy mistake of l for n as Kuli (Garuda) : and Svāgata (Vāyu and Brahmāṇḍa) appears as Sāśvata in the Viṣṇu, where the two forms may perhaps be connected through a possible Prakrit form read as Sūgata or Sāśata (g and s being mistaken).

Other divergencies of this kind might be noticed, and will occur to any one who examines the variant names. All such variations are not material, however, because the distinguished kings are well known and the names of the less known kings are not important except as supplying links in the chain of a genealogy ; and as long as the descents are labelled, it is not material whether the labels are perfectly accurate.

We may now consider sameness of name of different persons. It was quite common. Abundant examples might be given.<sup>1</sup> A few of the more important are cited here, and others will be found on consulting Macdonell and Keith's Vedic Index, Sørensen's Index to the Mahābhārata, and the Dictionaries. Forgetfulness of the fact that the same names reappeared in India as in other countries has led to the strangest conjectures and identifications.

Sameness of name was well known among kings and princes, for it is expressly declared that there were a hundred Prativindhyas, Nāgas, Haihayas, Dhṛtarāṣṭras, Brahmadattas, Paulas, Śvetas, Kāśis and Kuśas, eighty Janamejayas, a thousand Śāśabindus and two hundred Bhīmas and Bhīmas :<sup>2</sup> also that there were two Nalas, one king of Ayodhyā and the other the hero of the 'Story of Nala'.<sup>3</sup> So there were two famous Arjunas, Kārtavīrya and Pāṇḍava, and a third in Rigveda i, 222, 5. The genealogical lists in chapter XII show that other names were not uncommon, such as Divodāsa, Śrījaya and Sahadeva ; and the number of duplicates is very large. Further, it is expressly stated that in the main Paurava line were two Rkṣas, two Parīksīts, three Bhīmasenas and two Janamejayas ;<sup>4</sup> and all these appear in that genealogy, if we include Bhīmasena Pāṇḍava. Similarly brahmans had the same names, thus there were two Śaktis, four brahman Rāmas, Jāmadagnya and three others,<sup>1</sup> three named Suśravas,<sup>1</sup> two Śukas (pp. 64-5), &c. Also kings and brahmans often had the same names.<sup>2</sup> There were two royal Rāmas, one the famous king of Ayodhyā and the other Balarāma, besides four brahman Rāmas mentioned above: four Kṛṣṇas at least, the king, Dvaipāyana-Vyāsa, Devakīputra and Hārita: five Babhrus, a son of the Yādava Lomapāda, a king in the Druhyu line, the Yādava Devāvṛḍha's son, and two brahmans: and three Cyavanas, the Bhārgava rishi and two kings, one of N. Pañcāla and the other a descendant of Kuru.

Moreover kings, princes, and brahmans had the same names as gods and mythological beings and heavenly bodies. There was a Varuna among the Vasiṣṭhas<sup>3</sup> and among the Bhārgavas.<sup>4</sup> Agni was the name of an Aurva rishi (p. 68) and of a maharṣi.<sup>5</sup> Called Bharata were (1) the famous Paurava king, (2) Rāma's brother, and (3) a mythical king after whom (it is said) India was called Bhāratavarsa.<sup>6</sup> Aruṇa was the dawn, and two brahmans were so named. Śukra was the name of (1) the ancient Bhārgava rishi, (2) the planet Venus,<sup>7</sup> and (3) Jābāla. Named Bali was an Ānava king and also the Daitya king Vairocana (p. 63). Rishis and others were named after deities; and heavenly bodies were called after rishis and others, such as the seven stars of the Great Bear and the star Canopus.

Further, kings and brahmans sometimes had the same names as peoples and places. Thus there were a people called Āśmaka,<sup>8</sup> yet it was also the name of a king of Ayodhyā<sup>9</sup> and of a brahman.<sup>10</sup> Anga was the name of a country and people (East Bihar), and of the king after whom it was said to have been called, and also of the reputed author (Aurava) of Rigveda x, 138. Aja, king of Ayodhyā, had the same name as a people. Puskara was the name of (1) a son of Rāma's brother Bharata, (2) Nala's brother in the 'Story of Nala', (3) a town, the modern Pokhar, (4) one of the mythical continents, and (5) many other persons. Kuru, the Paurava king, had the same name as the people, the northern Kurus who dwelt beyond the Himalayas. Such similarity in name must not confuse what is wholly different. Thus king Kuru had nothing to do with the northern Kurus, and to connect him with them merely because of their common name is on a par with saying that Aṅga Aurava mentioned above was an Aṅga; or that Aśmaka king of Ayodhyā was an Aśmaka; or that the brahman Kirāta was one of the rude Kirāta folk.

There are no passages, as far as I know, that lend colour to any connexion between king Kuru's descendants (the Kurus) and the northern Kurus, except perhaps two: one says that in the time of Dhṛtarāṣṭra's and Pāṇḍu's youth the southern Kurus rivalled the northern Kurus;<sup>1</sup> and the other says that, when the victorious Pāṇḍavas re-entered Hastināpura, flags waving in the wind displayed in a way (iva) the southern and northern Kurus.<sup>2</sup> The people of Hastināpura were not Kurus, but the name Kuru of the royal family was extended to their people and country according to a common Indian usage.<sup>3</sup> Both passages occur in rhapsodies on the extraordinary happiness of the Kaurava kingdom at those times, and the similarity of name suggested the comparison of the Kurus (Kauravas) with the northern Kurus, a simple folk whose condition is portrayed as one of continual ideal bliss.<sup>4</sup> The comparisons are merely happy poetic similes, and do not indicate racial identity.<sup>5</sup> The adjective 'northern' was added to distinguish the Himalayan folk.

Kings and brahmans also bore the names<sup>6</sup> of animals, as Rkṣa, Rśabha, Kuruṅga, and Vatsa ; of birds, Śakuni, Haimṣa, Śuka, and Ulūka ; of trees and plants, as Aśvattha, Plakṣa, Nala, and Muñja ; of inanimate objects, as Śaṅkha, Dṛti, Aśman<sup>1</sup> and Drona ; and even of ceremonies, as Aśvamedha : also of parts of the body, as Bāhu, Karna, Cakṣus ; and of abstract ideas, as Śakti and Manyu.

Further, not only was sameness of name common, but names of father and son sometimes recur ; thus in the Paurava line there were two Parīksits with sons called Janamejaya. There is nothing improbable in such duplication, and it is less than has occurred in dynasties in other countries. Other instances are these. Śrutarvan Ārkṣa is praised in the Rigveda, and another is mentioned later as a contemporary of Kṛṣṇa.<sup>2</sup> There were two kings called Gaya son of Amūrtarayas (p. 40). There were two kings Karandhamas, one in the Vaiśala dynasty and the other in Turvasu's lineage.<sup>3</sup> The former had a son Avīkṣit and a grandson, the famous Marutta ; the latter had a son Marutta. They are sometimes confused.<sup>4</sup> One Pratardana, son of Divodāsa, was king of Kāśi and is one of the reputed authors of Rigveda x, 179 ; while Pratardana Daivodāsi, the reputed author of ix, 96, appears to have been a descendant of Divodāsa, king of North Pañcāla.

Purukutsa and his son Trasadasyu were kings of Ayodhyā. The Rigveda (iv, 42, 8, 9) mentions a king Trasadasyu, son of Purukutsa, who is a different and later person. The former Purukutsa was son of Māndhāṭṛ, as the Aikṣvāku genealogies show ; the latter is called Daurgaha and Gairikṣita,<sup>5</sup> 'son or descendant of Durgahā and Girikṣit'. The former Trasadasyu was prior to Bharata as the synchronisms in chapter XIII show ; the latter Trasadasyu was contemporary with Aśvamedha Bhārata<sup>6</sup> and is praised by Sobhari Kāṇva ;<sup>7</sup> Aśvamedha was a descendant of Bharata, and the Kāṇvas sprang from Bharata's descendant Ajamīḍha as will be shown in chapter XIX ; hence the latter Trasadasyu was far later than the former. There were thus two Purukutsas with sons named Trasadasyu. Those of Ayodhyā were well known, as even the Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa shows.<sup>1</sup> Those in the Rigveda were apparently Pūru kings<sup>2</sup> and probably belonged to some minor dynasty descended from Bharata; and are unknown to kṣatriya fame. There was no Ikṣvāku line of Pūru princes.

Similar remarks apply to queens and women as the following examples show.<sup>3</sup> Sameness of name was common; thus, three queens in the Paurava dynasty are said to have had the name Sunandā;<sup>4</sup> there were two Indrasenās,<sup>5</sup> two Satyavatīs (Rēika's wife and Śantanu's queen), and many Mālinīs. Women had the names of animals and birds, as two Gos (Śukra's wife and Yati's wife),<sup>6</sup> and Hainī; of plants or flowers, as Mālatī,<sup>7</sup> Padmini and Kamalā; of inanimate objects, as Akṣamālā, Aranī and Sītā; and also of abstract ideas, as Maryādā and Sannati.<sup>8</sup>

Further, women had the same names as rivers, and this fact is proved by the injunction that a brahman should not marry a maiden having such a name.<sup>9</sup> Thus the queen of king Purukutsa, son of Māndhāṭṛ, of Ayodhyā was named Narmadā;<sup>10</sup> Yauvanāśva's (Māndhāṭṛ's) granddaughter Kāverī was wife of Jahnu, king of Kānyakubja;<sup>11</sup> Sarasvatī was queen of the Paurava king Matināra or Rantināra,<sup>12</sup> and Kālindī (= Yamunā) was the name of the wife of Asita (= Bāhu) king of Ayodhyā,<sup>13</sup> and also of a wife of Kṛṣṇa.<sup>14</sup> There were three queens named Dṛṣadvatī, (1) wife of a king of Ayodhyā,<sup>1</sup> (2) Viśvāmitra's queen,<sup>2</sup> and (3) wife of Divodāsa, king of Kāśi.<sup>3</sup> Urvaśī was wife of Purūravas,<sup>4</sup> and Urvaśī was also the original name of the Ganges.<sup>5</sup> This sameness of name led to the identification of these women with the rivers, with sometimes a story to explain it—all obviously fanciful interpolations due to the desire to explain names (p. 75). So Narmadā is identified with the river (p. 69); and Kāverī because of Yuvanāśva's curse was turned into the river, which may mean either the large river in the south or the southern tributary of the Narbadā.<sup>6</sup> The former is improbable because it is more than a thousand miles distant; and the latter is no doubt meant, because the princess Kāverī was daughter or niece of queen Narmadā. Similarly, the remark that Yuvanāśva cursed his wife Gaurī and she became the river Bāhudā<sup>7</sup> is probably to be explained in a like way, though the connexion is wanting in the names as they stand.

Again, women had the same names as stars or constellations; thus there were two Rohinīs (one wife of Vasudeva,<sup>8</sup> and the other wife of Kṛṣṇa<sup>9</sup>), several Revatis (Balarāma's wife and others), a Citrā,<sup>10</sup> and Rādhā; hence Arundhatī,<sup>11</sup> wife of a Vasiṣṭha,<sup>12</sup> may not perhaps be mythical. Moreover, women had the same names as mythological persons, such as apsarases; thus Vadhryaśva's queen in the North Pañcāla dynasty was Menakā,<sup>13</sup> the queen of Trṇabindu of the Vaiśala dynasty was Alambuṣā,<sup>14</sup> and the Paurava Raudrāśva's queen was Ghṛtāci.<sup>15</sup> The last two are called apsarases, but Vadhryaśva's queen was certainly not an apsaras, and the sameness of name no doubt suggested that Ghṛtāci and Alambusā were apsarases.<sup>1</sup>

Such similarities were nothing uncommon. Manu iii, 9 gives the plainest proof that such names did really occur, for he says a brahman should not marry a maiden who bore the name of a constellation, tree or river, of a low caste, of a mountain, of a bird, snake or slave, or of anything terrifying. Women then had such names, and so also had men ; and the instances cited show that the range of names was wider than what Manu prohibits. In such conditions there was every chance of mistaking the application of names, confounding different persons of the same name,<sup>2</sup> confusing persons with things, devising fanciful explanations and fabricating mythology. Some illustrations of these tendencies have been given above, as the identifications of queens with rivers ; and others occur, as where Vyāsa's wife Arapi is turned into the piece of wood used for kindling fire, and so their son Śuka was born therefrom.<sup>3</sup>

It is quite permissible therefore to suspect similar fancies in other cases. For instance, Bhṛṣma is often called Gāngeya,<sup>4</sup> Jāhnavī's son<sup>5</sup> and Bhāgirathi's son,<sup>6</sup> and a fable is narrated that he was begotten by king Santanu of the river Ganges.<sup>7</sup> It is not euhemerism to suggest that his mother had the name Gāngā<sup>8</sup> or the patronymic Jāhnavī<sup>9</sup> or Bhāgirathī,<sup>10</sup> that tradition forgot her, and that fancy then confused her with and finally superseded her by the river. Again, it is said that king Gadhi of Kānyakubja was an incarnation of Indra, and the story suggests that the truth was he had also the name Indra or one of its synonyms such as Purandara.<sup>11</sup>

The same was alleged of king Vikukṣi of Ayodhyā, because probably he had also the name Devarāj.<sup>1</sup> Otherwise there appears to be no reason why those two kings should have received that distinction. Further examples will be found in the following pages and especially among the Vasiṣthas in chapter XVIII.

These examples and those in chapter V show how the misunderstanding of names and the desire to explain them led to the fabrication of fanciful tales and mythology. Indeed a great deal of the mythology is no doubt the work of brahmans who lacked the historical sense and mistook facts, and it is not euhemerism to look in that direction for the origin of silly stories and mythology connected with persons.

On the other hand, names may not be explained as eponymous or personifications without more ado (p. 18). Thus countries are said sometimes to have been named after kings, such as Gāndhāra,<sup>2</sup> Ānarta,<sup>3</sup> and Sauvīra;<sup>4</sup> and similarly towns, such as Śrāvastī,<sup>5</sup> Hastināpura<sup>6</sup> and Vaiśālī<sup>7</sup> from the kings who founded them. To assert that such kings are merely eponymous is to disregard the evidence supplied by many countries and all times. One might equally assert that Alexander, Seleucus and Constantine were merely eponymous heroes of Alexandria, Seleucia and Constantinople; or that Columbus, Tasman and Rhodes were mythical persons invented to account for Columbia, Tasmania and Rhodesia. It has been a universal practice to name countries, towns, mountains and rivers, especially in newly developed regions, after discoverers, conquerors, founders and celebrated men, and the same method must have been adopted by the Aryans who conquered North India and founded new kingdoms and towns there.

CHAPTER XII

SYNCHRONISMS AND TABLE OF ROYAL GENEALOGIES

THE genealogies regarded singly help to elucidate difficulties, as in distinguishing between different kings and rishis of the same names, and how necessary this is will appear from the articles on Divodāsa, Vasiṣṭha, Viśvāmitra, Bharadvāja, &c., in the Vedic Index, where the information drawn solely from Vedic literature with its lack of the historical sense leaves many points in perplexity, because different persons of the same name cannot be distinguished therefrom.

Thus, in the first place, the genealogies show there were at least two kings named Divodāsa, one a king of Kāśi, and the other a king of N. Pañcāla, but the Vedic Index combines them in its article 'Divodāsa'. Similarly, there were two Sudāsas, one a king of Ayodhyā whose son was Kalmāṣapāda, and the other a king of N. Pañcāla, the Sudās of the Rigveda; but they have been confused in the stories about the murder of the rishi Śakti (chapter XVIII). Secondly, as regards families. The attempt to elucidate the Bharatas or Bhāratas in the Vedic Index is attended with perplexity, but the whole of the difficulties disappear when we learn from the genealogies that Bharata, the great Paurava king, had a numerous progeny, and that his descendants divided into many branches, some of which were kṣatriyas and others became brahmans (chapter XXIII). Thirdly, as regards different individuals of rishi families, who are often mentioned merely by their simple gotra name, as Bhṛgu, Vasiṣṭha, Viśvāmitra, &c. The Vedic literature often does not distinguish them, but the genealogies show that when a Vasiṣṭha is mentioned in connexion with Hariscandra, Sagara, Kalmāṣapāda, and Daśaratha of Ayodhyā, a different person is meant in each case.

The genealogies considered singly, however, are of little chronological value, because we have no data for providing a definite historical setting for individual kings, and because, though they aim at fullness, yet admittedly they do not record the name of every king (chapter IX), so that their length or brevity does not fix the chronological durations of the dynasties. A clear illustration of this appears on comparing the Ayodhyā and Vaiśala lines, for both start from Manu, and Daśaratha of the former was contemporary with Pramati of the latter according to the Rāmāyaṇa, yet the lists of the latter line contain only about half as many names as the lists of the former to that point. But the genealogies would become of relative historical value if they can be connected together so as to supplement one another and form a combined and consistent scheme, in which each checks and elucidates the others, so that all settle into an arrangement relatively harmonious. The genealogies are, for the most part, separate and independent, each pursuing its own course without concerning itself with others, yet co-ordinate allusions do occur incidentally sometimes. If points of contact can be discovered either in them or elsewhere, which bring kings in two or more lines into connexion, they help towards the construction of a combined genealogical scheme ; and since such points generally occur incidentally, co-ordination not being the intention of the genealogists, the co-ordination gains a definite probability of being real and true. The more numerous such points, the more abundant become the means of constructing and testing the combined framework and the greater the probability of historical trustworthiness. That is, we must seek for synchronisms.

In dealing with synchronisms certain cautions must be borne in mind. First must be noted the lax use of personal names as gotra names instead of patronymics. Kṣatriya tradition generally distinguishes between personal names and patronymics, and the same care is often found in the Brāhmaṇas and Upaniṣads, as where Janamejaya is styled Pārikṣita, Sahadeva Sārījaya, and Somaka Sāhadevya ;<sup>1</sup> but sometimes, especially in the Veda, the personal name is used instead of the patronymic, and thus Vasiṣṭha,<sup>2</sup> Viśvāmitra,<sup>3</sup> Jamadagni,<sup>4</sup> Kaṇva,<sup>5</sup> &c., are used in the plural collectively for Vasiṣṭhas, Vaiśvāmitras, Jamadagnyas, Kaṇvas, &c. ; and similarly Yadus, Turvaśas, Druhyus, Anus and Pūrus are spoken of.<sup>6</sup> of persons having the same name or patronymic, so that, to cite the most striking instances, all the Vasiṣṭhas became jumbled into one Vasiṣṭha and all the Viśvāmitras into one Viśvāmitra. Hence the mention of a person by the simple name is no sure criterion that the original person of that name is intended, but often means a descendant. This must be especially observed when brahmans are mentioned only by their gotra names. Thus among the Bhārgavas Uśanas-Śukra,<sup>1</sup> Cyavana,<sup>2</sup> his descendant Rečika,<sup>3</sup> his grandson Rāma Jāmadagnya,<sup>4</sup> and another late rishi<sup>5</sup> are all called Bhr̥gu simply. The only safe way of distinguishing brahmans in references of an historical kind is to discriminate them according to the kings with whom they were associated, for the royal genealogies afford the only chronological criteria. Otherwise the confusion is inextricable, as may be seen in the perplexities attending the Vasiṣṭhas, Bharadvājas, Viśvāmitras, &c., in the Vedic Index.

Secondly, the use of a patronymic does not always denote that the person to whom it is applied was the son of the bearer of the simple name, but often means a descendant. This is patent as regards tribal or family names, such as Yādava, Paurava, Bhārata and Kaurava; and is also clear in less comprehensive names, as when Rāma is called Rāghava after his great grandfather Raghu,<sup>6</sup> and Kṛṣṇa is styled Dāśarha, Mādhava, Sātvata, Vārṣneya and Śauri after various ancestors,<sup>7</sup> as well as Vāsudeva after his father. This use of patronymics seems to be more frequent in kṣatriya than in brahmanic traditions; thus Rečika (p. 68) and the later rishi Agni of Sagara's time<sup>8</sup> are both called Aurva after their common ancestor Ūrva. Moreover, a man had various patronymics from different ancestors, and the choice in poetry was often governed by the metre; and perhaps this may explain Kakṣīvant's patronymic Ausīja in Rigveda i, 18, 1, instead of Dairghatamasa or Aucathya.<sup>9</sup>

Thirdly, sameness of name does not always imply identity of person, and this is abundantly clear from what has been pointed out in the last chapter. Whether identity can be reasonably inferred must depend on other considerations, especially any data of a chronological kind. Thus, when it is said that Māndhāṭr of Ayodhyā married Śāśabindu's daughter Caitrarathī Bindumati,<sup>1</sup> it may be safely inferred from the position and circumstances of both that Śāśabindu was the famous Yādava king, son of Citraratha. But when the Mahābhārata says that Ahamyāti of the Lunar race married Kṛtavīrya's daughter,<sup>2</sup> it is clear that it cannot mean Kṛtavīrya the Haihaya king, for the two kings were widely apart in time.

Synchronistic references occur in three ways: first, those that are definite and have every appearance of being genuine and that when tested with other allusions are harmonious; secondly, those that may be true but are too vague to be of any use; and thirdly, those that are spurious and untrue. The latter two classes may be briefly considered before we proceed to genuine synchronisms.

Of the second class are notices of rishis and kings by their gotra names merely, as where Janaka, king of Videha, is introduced in various philosophical discussions, for Janaka was the royal family name and many Janakas are mentioned (chapter VIII); or where personal names are used as gotra names, such as the references to Bharadvājas at different times.

The third class of references requires rather more notice, because they are sometimes precise and circumstantial, but examination shows their falsity. It comprises three kinds of allusions: first, those that are purely laudatory and introduce persons on special occasions in defiance of chronology merely to enhance the dignity of the hero or the occasion; secondly, those that have grown or been developed out of some allusion but are mistaken; and thirdly, those that are wholly spurious.

Of the first of these kinds is the introduction of famous rishis, as noticed at page 67; and as where it is said the Ātreyā rishi Durvāsas visited the Pāṇḍavas in their exile,<sup>3</sup> though his real period was far anterior and he is introduced into the story of Śakuntalā, their distant ancestress. It is generally rishis who appear on such occasions in defiance of chronology, and rarely that kings so appear. The second kind comprises all sorts of notices, from brief allusions to long stories. As such may be cited these—Māndhāṭr conquered the Aṅga Bṛhadratha,<sup>1</sup> who was long posterior : and Bhagīratha was a contemporary of Jahnu, king of Kānyakubja.<sup>2</sup> It is in brahmanical stories that such spurious synchronisms are generally found, and they are often mere expedients for hanging some precept or doctrine upon, as that Suhotra, the Paurava king, encountered Śivi Auśinara to learn deference to superior virtue<sup>3</sup> ; or for the purpose of exalting the dignity of brahmans, as that Agastya vanquished Nahuṣa.<sup>4</sup> Similarly are erroneously connected Madhucchandas Vaiśvāmitra as priest to Śayāti,<sup>5</sup> Cyavana as cursing the Haihaya king Kṛtavīrya,<sup>6</sup> and many others.<sup>7</sup>

The story of Gālava's doings<sup>8</sup> is an excellent instance of the third kind of spurious synchronisms. In order to earn the special fee required by his teacher Viśvāmitra he obtained from king Yayāti Nahuṣa<sup>9</sup> his daughter Mādhavī and offered her in turn to king Haryāśva of Ayodhyā, king Divodāsa of Kāśi, king Uśinara of Bhojanagara, and Viśvāmitra himself, each for a fourth part of the fee, and they begot of her one son each, Vasumanas, Pratardana, Śivi and Aṣṭaka respectively. Then he returned her to her father. This story makes all those kings and Viśvāmitra contemporary, and three facts show its absurdity. First, Uśinara was a descendant of Anu, Yayāti's son, by some generations; secondly, this the first Viśvāmitra was a distant descendant in the Kānyakubja line, which sprang out of the Aila race just before Yayāti's time; and thirdly, Gālava was Viśvāmitra's own son!<sup>10</sup>—a fact of which the story is ignorant.<sup>11</sup> The appended table of genealogies will display these errors clearly. Haryāśva and Uśinara probably were contemporaries, but Viśvāmitra was later and Divodāsa (Pratardana's father) later still, as will be shown by the genuine synchronisms in the next chapter; and Yayāti was far earlier. The story makes kings Vasumanas, Pratardana, Śivi and Aṣṭaka brothers and contemporaries, and this statement appears elsewhere also,<sup>1</sup> especially in a further fable<sup>2</sup> that Yayāti was cast out from heaven for pride and fell at Naimiṣa forest, where those four kings were assembled, and they were made known to him as his daughter's sons. The story is manifestly a brahmanical fabrication, and may have been developed from the fact that the three verses of which Rigveda x, 179 consists are attributed one each to Śivi, Pratardana and Vasumanas (who is called son of Ruśadaśva or Rohidaśva, which are almost synonymous with Haryaśva), in order to explain how the single verses composed by these three kings became combined into one hymn.<sup>3</sup> But how Aṣṭaka is joined with them is uncertain.

We may now investigate what are genuine synchronisms, and these will be dealt with in the next two chapters. It will be convenient, however, for ease of reference to set out the combined scheme of genealogies of all the important dynasties, as established by genuine synchronisms, and this is displayed in the following table. The dynasties have been arranged in the table according to geographical position, as far as is feasible, those that reigned in the west on the left side, those in the east on the right, and the others in the middle. The names of kings whose positions are fixed by synchronisms or otherwise are printed in italics, and the famous kings are indicated by an asterisk. As already explained, the lists are not equally full, and the deficiencies appear very plainly from the table; hence, where there are no synchronisms and the lists are defective, the names that occur are spaced out, but this arrangement is only tentative and the position of such a name merely indicates the best possible approximation. Among the last kings of Videha, Kṛtakṣṇa is mentioned,<sup>4</sup> and kings later than the battle are set out in the list in chapter XXVII. Smaller or shorter dynasties, which have not been brought into this list, are given in chapters VIII and IX, such as the Śāryatas, Nābhāgas and various branches of the Yādavas.

CHAPTER XIII

MAJOR SYNCHRONISMS ESTABLISHED

In endeavouring to establish synchronisms, first may be noticed those kings and rishis about whom there are copious or very clear statements.

There is a very early group of synchronous kings. The Aikṣvāku genealogy of Ayodhyā states plainly that Prasenajit's son Yuvanāśva married Gaurī and their son was Māndhāṭṛ. The Paurava genealogy says Matināra's daughter Gaurī was mother of Māndhāṭṛ. Here there can be no doubt, for the statements are separate and explicit (chapter VI). Prasenajit therefore was contemporary with Matināra, Yuvanāśva was one generation below and Māndhāṭṛ two generations. Further, the Ayodhyā genealogy says that Māndhāṭṛ married Śaśabindu's daughter Bindumatī Caitrarathī, who was the eldest of many brothers;<sup>1</sup> and the Yādava genealogy names Śaśabindu, son of Citraratha, as a famous king who had very many sons.<sup>2</sup> Here also there can be no doubt; hence Māndhāṭṛ was one generation below Śaśabindu. Next Jahnu of Kānyakubja married the granddaughter of Yuvanāśva,<sup>3</sup> that is, Māndhāṭṛ; hence he was two generations below Māndhāṭṛ.<sup>4</sup> From all these we have a clear set of synchronisms thus—

The next group of synchronisms is that in which Viśvāmitra and his nephew Jamadagni are the central figures. King Kṛtavīrya of the Haihayas had the Bhārgavas as his priests and enriched them. His successors tried to recover the wealth, but the Bhārgavas resisted. The Haihayas maltreated them, and the Bhārgavas fled to other countries for safety.<sup>1</sup> Gādhi or Gāthi was then king of Kānyakubja and had a daughter Satyavatī. The Bhārgava rishi R̄cīka Aurva, son of Urva, married her and had a son Jamadagni, and about the same time Gādhi had a son<sup>2</sup> Viśvaratha.<sup>3</sup> Viśvaratha, after succeeding to the kingdom,<sup>4</sup> relinquished it, placed his family in a hermitage near Ayodhyā<sup>5</sup> and gave himself up to austerities for twelve years, after which he became a brahman with the name Viśvāmitra. He returned and succoured prince Satyavrata Triśanku<sup>6</sup> of Ayodhyā who had befriended his family, and restored him to the throne, overcoming the opposition of the then Vasiṣṭha,<sup>7</sup> whose personal name was Devarāj.<sup>8</sup> Jamadagni married Kāmalī Renukā, daughter of Renu, a minor king belonging to the Ikṣvāku race, and their son was Rāma Jāmadagnya.<sup>9</sup> Triśanku was succeeded by his son Hariścandra, who had a son Rohita, and Viśvāmitra and Jamadagni attended as priests at the sacrifice at which Sunahśepa was substituted for Rohita.<sup>10</sup> Kṛtavīrya was succeeded by his son Arjuna Kārtavīrya, who was a great king (p. 41). After a long reign he had dissension with Jamadagni, his sons killed

Jamadagni, and Rāma killed him.<sup>1</sup> Here then we have these synchronisms :—

Haihaya	Bhārgava	Kānyakuoja	Aikṣvāku
Kṛtavīrya	Ūrva	Gādhi	Trayyāruṇa
Arjuna	Reika	Satyavatī
	Jamadagni	Viśvāmitra	Triśāṅku
			Hariścandra
	Rāma <sup>2</sup>		Rohita

This group is connected with the preceding group by both the Ayodhyā and Kānyakubja genealogies, and also by the collateral statement that Kuśika, Gādhi's father, married Paurukutsī, a 'descendant of Purukutsa', and she was Gādhi's mother.<sup>3</sup> Jahnu was a contemporary of Purukutsa's son Trasadasyu (ante), and Viśvāmitra of Triśāṅku. The genealogies give seven descents from Jahnu to Viśvāmitra, and eight descents from Trasadasyu to Triśāṅku. They thus tally, and Paurukutsī was Purukutsa's descendant in about the sixth degree.

<sup>1</sup> MBh i, 104, 4172 : iii, 115, 11035 ; 116, 11089–98 ; 117, 10202–3 : vii, 70, 2429 : xii, 49, 1761–8. Vā 94, 38, 47. Bd iii, 69, 38, 48. Hv 34, 1890. Viś iv, 11, 7. Mat 43, 44. <sup>2</sup> It should be noted that a curious statement occurs in the Ayodhyā genealogy in six Puranas, which speaks of Rāma at a much later time, in the reign of king Mūlaka (chap. VIII). Vā 88, 178–9 and Bd iii, 63, 178–9 say Mūlaka was in fear of Rāma and lived protected by a guard of women (nārī-kavaca). Lg i, 66, 29, Kūr i, 21, 14, Viś iv, 4, 38 and Bhāg ix, 9, 40 say much the same. This must be connected with the statement in MBh xii, 49, 1770–8, which says that a thousand years after Rāma had destroyed all the kṣatriyas, a fresh generation of them, including Pratardana and others, had grown up, and he destroyed them all again and again till twenty-one times; and with the further statement (ibid. 1792–3) that then Sarvakarman, who is placed as king of Ayodhyā at the same time as Mūlaka (chap. VIII), was brought up in secret. All this MBh account is brahmanic and mostly fable; hence these two statements are of no chronological value, and the statement about Mūlaka would seem to be a reflex of the fable, incorporated in the Ayodhyā genealogy, while the secret bringing up would explain the phrase nārī-kavaca. This matter is further noticed in chap. XXV. A similar fanciful mistake, MBh v, 146, 4978–81.

<sup>3</sup> Vā 91, 63–6 ; Bd iii, 66, 33–6 ; Br 10, 24–8 ; and Hv 27, 1426–30 have the fullest text. Collated they suggest this reading :—

Gādhir nāmābhavat putraḥ Kauśikāḥ Pākaśāsanah
Paurukutsy abhiavad bhāryā Gādhis tasyām ajayata.

There are further synchronisms of certain Kāśi kings with Bhadraśrenya and the Tālajaṅghas, which arise out of a story told in the Kāśi genealogy.<sup>4</sup> It runs thus. Divodāsa, son of Bhīmaratha, was king of Kāśi and (in consequence of a curse, it is alleged) abandoned his capital Vārāṇasī, and established himself in another city on the river Gomatī in the extreme east of his territory. Bhadraśrenya, the Haihaya king, seized the kingdom,<sup>5</sup> and a Rākṣasa named Kṣemaka occupied the city. Divodāsa recovered the kingdom from Bhadraśrenya's sons, but afterwards Bhadraśrenya's son Durdama re-established himself in it. Divodāsa was succeeded by his brother Aśtaratha. Pratardana was the son of Divodāsa, and he recovered the kingdom and put an end to the strife with the Haihayas. His grandson Alarka killed the Rākṣasa Kṣemaka and regained the city. All these events occupied a thousand years, that is, a very long time.

This story is supplemented by a further fragment of kṣatriya tradition.<sup>1</sup> The piece of genealogy prefixed to the latter is confused, but shows this much, that the tradition relates to the Haihayas after the time of Tālajāṅgha and in particular to the descendants of king Vitahavya among them.<sup>2</sup> Haryaśva king of the Kāśis fought with the Vitahavya-Haihayas at the confluence of the Ganges and Jumna. They killed him and returned to the city of the Vatsyas.<sup>3</sup> His son was Sudeva and they defeated him. His son was Divodāsa, and he retreated and built a city, called Vārāṇasī also, at the confluence of the Ganges and Gomati. They attacked, defeated and drove him from his city. He took refuge with his purohita Bharadvāja. His son Pratardana attacked and destroyed the Vaitahavyas, and the Vitahavya king found refuge with a Bhṛgu rishi, who saved him by declaring and making him a brahman.<sup>4</sup> This is confirmed from brahmanic books, which say Bharadvāja was Divodāsa's purohita and gave Pratardana the kingdom.<sup>5</sup>

Putting the two stories together, it is clear that the former gives the beginning and the end of the long contest between the Haihayas and Kāśis; that the latter narrates the latter part of it; that in the Kāśi dynasty there were two Divodāsas, one who was son of Bhīmaratha at the beginning and the other who was son of Sudeva at the end; that between them reigned at least three kings, Aṣṭāratha, Haryaśva and Sudeva; that the former story prima facie, but not necessarily, confuses the two Divodāsas;<sup>6</sup> and that Pratardana<sup>7</sup> was son of Divodāsa II. It is also plain that

<sup>5</sup> Pañcavimśa Brāhm xv, 3, 7. Kāthaka Saṃhitā xxi, 10. Vedic Index ii, 98. These refer to this Divodāsa and not the Rigvedic Divodāsa of N. Pañcīla. Also MBh xiii, 34, 2126. It is doubtful which Divodāsa is meant in xii, 96, 3577. The allusion in xii, 99, 3664 seems spurious.

Vitanavya of the second story<sup>1</sup> = Vitihotra of the genealogies (chapter IX), both being Haihaya kings subsequent to Tālajaṅgha. The whole account thus becomes quite intelligible, the only uncertain point being, which Divodāsa built the second capital; he was probably Divodāsa I, but this point is not material here.

The first story makes Divodāsa I contemporary with Bhadraśrenya and Durdama. The second makes Haryaśva contemporary with Vītahavya's sons, so that he falls after Vitihotra of the genealogies. The intermediate kings have been lost, as would be natural in the confusion of the dispossession.<sup>2</sup> Hence Haryaśva's great grandson Pratardana would fall just after Supratīka, the last Vitihotra-Haihaya king named in the genealogies, and this would be his natural position as the destroyer of the Vītahavya or Vitihotra family. Pratardana did not subdue all the Haihayas. It was Sagara who did that, hence Pratardana cannot be placed after Sagara. Sagara evidently completed what Pratardana began, hence he must be placed alongside Pratardana. These traditions then establish the following synchronisms, and these stories and the genealogies are in harmony:—

Kāsi	Haihayas	Ayodhyā
Divodāsa I	Bhadraśrenya
Aṣṭāratha	Durdama
	Kanaka
	Kṛtavīrya
	Arjuna Kārtavīrya

	Jayadhvaja	Hariścandra

Haryaśva	Ananta	Vṛka
Sudeva	Durjaya	Bāhu (Asita)

These results lead on to further synchronisms in and after Sagara's time. The Haihayas, as mentioned, overran Madhyadeśa, so that the Paurava kingdom in the Ganges-Jumna doab was overthrown ; and this conclusion is corroborated by the fact that the hordes from the north-west, who aided them in the conquest of Ayodhyā, could not have reached it without passing over the Paurava territory and also the Kānyakubja kingdom, which disappeared from this time, for its genealogy ceases with Viśvāmitra's grandson Lauhi. Sagara's destruction of the Haihaya power would naturally have carried him to the Narbadā and their capital there, Māhiṣmati. South of that was the kingdom of Vidarbha, and there are notices which show that it had just come into existence then. An account of Sagara's expedition there says the Vidarbha king made peace with him by giving him his daughter Keśinī in marriage,<sup>1</sup> and the genealogies say clearly that Sagara had two wives, and the best of them name one as Keśinī daughter of Vidarbha himself,<sup>2</sup> who gave his name to the country. Vidarbha therefore was a generation earlier than Sagara.

This synchronism may be combined with another. There were two kings named Marutta, one son of Avikṣit and grandson of Karandhama of the Vaiśāla dynasty (p. 39), and the other, son of Karandhama of Turvasu's lineage ; and they must be carefully distinguished. The latter had no son and adopted Duṣyanta the Paurava.<sup>3</sup> Duṣyanta afterwards recovered the Paurava kingdom, revived the dynasty, and so is styled its varṇa-kara.<sup>4</sup> The adoption could only have taken place before he gained that position, and this corroborates the conclusion that that kingdom was in abeyance, so that Duṣyanta, as the heir in exile, might naturally accept such adoption. He could only have restored the Paurava dynasty after the Haihaya power had been destroyed by Sagara and Sagara's empire had ended, so that he would be one or two generations later than this Marutta, and two later than Sagara. We have then these synchronisms :—

There are more synchronisms belonging to the same period, in which the Āṅgirasa rishis Br̥haspati, Dirghatamas and Bharadvāja are the central figures.

First is a story about Br̥haspati and Samvarta, which contains pieces of tradition, though largely marred by later extravagances.<sup>1</sup> Āṅgiras<sup>2</sup> was priest to king Karandhama of the Vaiśāla dynasty. Karandhama's son was Avikṣit, and his son the famous Marutta Āviṣṭa.<sup>3</sup> Āṅgiras had two sons, Br̥haspati and Samvarta, who were thus Marutta's hereditary priests<sup>4</sup> and lived in his kingdom of Vaiśāli. They were at perpetual strife. Br̥haspati declined to be Marutta's priest, declaring that he was Indra's priest,<sup>5</sup> so Marutta chose Samvarta and by his aid performed magnificent sacrifices.<sup>6</sup> This Marutta gave his daughter to Āṅgiras Samvarta (chapter XI).

Another story runs thus.<sup>7</sup> There were two rishis, Br̥haspati<sup>8</sup> and his elder brother, who is called Ucathya in the Vedārthadīpikā and Br̥haddevatā, Utathya in the Mahābhārata, Uṣija in the Brahmāṇḍa and Matsya, and Aṣīja or Asīja (but sometimes Uṣija) in

<sup>5</sup> So also MBh i, 170, 6464. He seems to be confused, at least partially, with the mythical divine priest Br̥haspati.

<sup>6</sup> Also MBh iii, 129, 10528-9 : vii, 55, 2170-3: xii, 29, 910-13. Mārk 130 (129), 11-18. Aitareya Brāhm viii, 4, 21 says he consecrated Marutta. Rām vii, 18 has a brahmanical fable: so also MBh xiv, 64; 65.

<sup>7</sup> MBh i, 104, 4179-92: xii, 343, 13177-82. Bd iii, 74, 36-46. Bhāg ix, 20, 36-8. Twice narrated in Vā 99, 36-46, 141-50 and Mat 48, 32-42; 49, 17-26. Br̥hadd iv, 11-15. Vedārth on Rīgv vi, 52. These versions have differences, and have received later touches, especially where the incidents are made to supply explanation of names.

the Vāyu. Utathya is a very common variant for Ucathya,<sup>1</sup> and Asija a mistake for Uśija. There are therefore two distinct names, Ucathya and Uśija, and it will be shown further on that Ucathya is the correct name of this rishi. He had a wife Mamatā, and their son was Dirghatamas, who was born blind. Brhaspati is said to have consorted with her, and his son was Bharadvāja. That there was a rishi Dirghatamas Aucathya Māmateya, 'son of Ucathya and Mamatā', who was blind, is proved by the Rigveda;<sup>2</sup> and that there was also a rishi Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya, 'son of Brhaspati', is asserted by the Sarvānukramaṇi in ascribing many hymns in book VI to him.<sup>3</sup>

This story continues with Dirghatamas.<sup>4</sup> He lived in his paternal cousin's hermitage, whom the Puranas apparently call Śaradvant, but indulged in gross immorality or misbehaved towards the wife of the younger Autathya<sup>5</sup> (Aucathya). Hence he was expelled and set adrift in the Ganges. He was carried downstream to the Eastern Ānava kingdom and was there welcomed by king Bali. This incident finds support in the Rigveda (i, 158, 3. 5), where he speaks of having been delivered from bodily hurt and from danger in the rivers; and it is not improbable, because these Āngirasa rishis were living, as mentioned above, in the kingdom of Vaiśāli, so that he might easily have been put on a raft in the Ganges there and have drifted some seventy miles down to the Monghyr and Bhāgalpur country, which was the Ānava realm, and was soon afterwards called the Āṅga kingdom. There Dirghatamas married the queen's śūdra nurse and had Kakṣīvant and other sons;<sup>6</sup> and at Bali's desire begot of the queen Sudesnā five sons, Āṅga, Vaṅga, Kaliṅga, Puṇḍra and Suhma, who were called the Bāleya kṣatra and also Bāleya brahmans. This is strange yet not

<sup>4</sup> Vā 99, 26-34, 47-97. Bd iii, 74, 25-34, 47-100. Mat 48, 23-9, 43-89. The last part in Hv 31, 1684-90; Br 13, 29-31; Viś iv, 18, 1; Bhāg ix, 23, 5. MBh i, 104, 4193-221, with variations: xii, 343, 13177-84. Brhadd iv, 21-5, where the sequel shows the word jīrṇa is a manifest mistake. Similarly Vedārth on Rigv i, 116.

improbable, for brahmans did render such services.<sup>1</sup> Afterwards he gained his sight,<sup>2</sup> and assumed the name Gotama or Gautama.<sup>3</sup>

Next, there is a story about the famous Paurava king, Dusyanta's son Bharata, and Bharadvāja.<sup>4</sup> Bharata had three wives and sons by them; they killed their sons because he was disappointed in them, and he was thus bereft of heirs. In order to obtain a son he performed many sacrifices and lastly made an offering to the Maruts; they gave him<sup>5</sup> Bṛhaspati's son Bharadvāja as an adopted son. Bharadvāja thus became a ksatriya; he did not succeed Bharata, but begot a son named Vitatha; Bharata then died. Bharadvāja afterwards consecrated Vitatha as the successor, and then either died or departed to the forest.<sup>6</sup> This is a very remarkable <sup>1</sup> Thus, it is said, a Vasiṣṭha begot Aśmaka of king Kalmāṣapāda's queen; MBh i, 122, 4736-7; 177, 6787-91; Vā 88, 177; Bd iii, 63, 177; Lg i, 66, 27-8; Kūr i, 21, 12-13; Bhāg ix, 9, 38-9. Vyāsa begot Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Pāṇḍu. See also MBh i, 61, 2460-4; 104, 4176-8. Brahmans with their ascetic habits escaped the enervating influences of courts.

<sup>6</sup> The fullest and best account is given by Mat 49, 27-34 and Vā 99, 152-8, which are closely alike. Also Hv 32, 1727-31 and Br 13, 59-61 (the former being fuller) which are based on the same original text. The texts collated suggest the following version:

tasmin kāle tu Bharato babubhīḥ kratubhīr vibhūḥ story and deserves careful consideration, because it throws much light on the traditional accounts of Bharata's successors, the Bharatas or Bhāratas.

It is emphasized by the statement in the Vāyu that Bharadvāja by the adoption became a kṣatriya and had two fathers, and so was called dvīmūṣyāyaṇa.<sup>1</sup> The Matsya varies this statement, but still says that from Bharadvāja were descended brahmans and kṣatriyas who were known as dvīmūṣyāyaṇa-kaulīṇas,<sup>2</sup> which also appears to be true.<sup>3</sup> Of these two versions the Vāyu's is manifestly the earlier, for the statement that a distinguished brahman became a kṣatriya's son could never have come from a brahmanic source, and that in the Matsya is also plainly a softening down of it, as the retention of the word dvīmūṣyāyaṇa shows, which otherwise was uncalled for.<sup>4</sup> Neither version could have been composed by the brahmans after the Purana passed into their hands as described in chapter II. The Vāyu's statement is manifestly ancient kṣatriya tradition, which they found in the Purana and could not discard as false, but which was unpalatable and was therefore modified in the Matsya, and also in some copies of the Vāyu.<sup>5</sup>

According to the brahman vāṁśas there were two Āṅgirasa rishis, Ucathya and Uśija,<sup>6</sup> and that the names are distinct is proved by the fact that Aucathya<sup>7</sup> occurs in Rigveda i, 158, 1, 4, and Auśija in i, 18, 1 and x, 99, 11. The former means Dirghatamas by implication and he is so called in the Anukramaṇī as author of hymns i, 140-64. He is made son of Ucathya in the foregoing story by the Mahābhārata, Bṛhaddevatā and Vedārthadīpikā, but son of Uśija in the Purana version and called Auśija in the dvīmūṣyāyaṇa-kaulīṇāḥ smṛtās te dvi-vidbena ca.

dvīmūṣyāyaṇa-nāmāṇāḥ smṛtā dvi-pitaras tu vai.

<sup>6</sup> Vā 59, 90, 93; 65, 100. Bd ii, 32, 99; iii, 1, 105-6. Mat 196, 4 (read Uśijām), 11.

vamśas.<sup>1</sup> Presumably therefore both Ucathya and Uśija were his ancestors, and this is further corroborated. Auśija in the first passage above is Kakṣīvant, and in the second Rjiśvan. Kakṣīvant is called 'born of Uśij' by the Anukramaṇi and Vedārthadīpikā on Rigveda i, 116, and therefore Auśija<sup>2</sup> in the latter, relying on the words Kakṣīvantam ya Auśijah in i, 18, 1. This would be a metronymic, if the śūdra woman whom Dirghatamas married was named Uśij.<sup>3</sup> This may be true, yet seems rather to be a guess to explain the appellation, for it is unnecessary inasmuch as Kakṣīvant, being Dirghatamas's son, had the patronymic Auśija already.<sup>4</sup> Moreover, that derivation is not really a satisfactory explanation, for Rjiśvan was also Auśija as mentioned above, and it cannot hold good for him, because (1) he is called Vaidathina, 'son (or descendant) of Vidathin', in Rigveda iv. 16, 13, and Vidathin was the name of a Bharadvāja,<sup>5</sup> and (2) it is said he was son of 'Bharadvāja'.<sup>6</sup> Thus Rjiśvan was descended from Vidathin Bharadvāja,<sup>7</sup> and not from Dirghatamas and that śūdra woman, and his appellation Auśija cannot be a metronymic, but is really a patronymic. It proves that his father or ancestor Vidathin Bharadvāja was descended from Uśija, and that there was an ancestor Uśija. 'Uśij' seems to have been invented to explain Auśija<sup>8</sup> through the lack of the historical sense. Uśija then was ancestor of both Dirghatamas and Bharadvāja, and Dirghatamas's father was Ucathya. Uśija therefore must have been ancestor of their fathers,<sup>9</sup> Ucathya

<sup>6</sup> So Vedārth on Rigv vi, 5, 2, which assigns to 'Bharadvāja' four other 'sons', Suhotra, Sunahotra, Nara and Garga, all five being 'grandsons' of both Brhaspati and Bharata; and this Bharadvāja was Vidathin (see p. 163). It has however abbreviated the genealogy, for they were not sons but descendants, see Table of Pauravas (chap. IX) and chap. XXIII.

<sup>7</sup> The mention of Vaidathina as apparently distinct from Rjiśvan in Rigv v, 29, 11, does not invalidate this, for the preceding note shows there were other Vaidathinas.

and Br̥haspati, who were thus not sons but descendants of Āngiras.<sup>1</sup> Ucathya and Br̥haspati may have been brothers as stated above and Samvarta may have been their youngest brother;<sup>2</sup> and Uśija may well have been their father.<sup>3</sup> The Puranas in the above story seem to have confused Uśija with his son or descendant Ucathya.

Vitatha was clearly Bharadvāja's son, as the Brahma and Harivaimśa say explicitly in line 12, which is their reading. The Vāyu<sup>4</sup> and Matsya<sup>5</sup> readings of this line make out that Bharadvāja was known as Vitatha, but line 15, which both of them and also the Brahma and Harivaimśa have, stultifies that, for necessarily Bharadvāja was born before the adoption, and line 16, which the Matsya has and the Brahma and Harivaimśa<sup>6</sup> give more clearly, shows that Vitatha and Bharadvāja were different persons. The confusion of the two will be explained farther on. Consequently the reading of the Brahma and Harivaimśa in line 12 is right, and those of the Vāyu and Matsya require only the simple emendation of Bharadvājaḥ to Bharadvājāt or Bhāradvājāt and would then agree. The fact that Bharata's successors in the Paurava line were really of brahmanic origin is of the highest importance, and helps to elucidate many peculiar features in their history.

The Aitareya Brāhmaṇa says Dirghatamas consecrated Bharata with the mahābhiṣeka.<sup>7</sup> He could not have done that until he had established his reputation, that is, not until he was old; and he certainly lived to a great age.<sup>8</sup> He would therefore be two (or even possibly three) generations senior to Bharata. Hence the first Bharadvāja, who was his equal in age, could not have been taken as soon as born to Bharata as a son, as alleged.<sup>9</sup> That both these rishis were some two generations older than Bharata is corroborated by the facts shown above that Bharadvāja was purohita to Divodāsa, king of Kāśi, and, if a young man then, would have been contemporary with Pratardana, who was contemporary with Sagara and one or two generations prior to Dusyanta—that is, two or three

prior to Bharata. The aged Dīrghatamas, and Bharadvāja also,<sup>1</sup> may thus have lived till the beginning of Bharata's reign. Though that, the first, Bharadvāja could not have been given in adoption to Bharata, yet his grandson (or perhaps great grandson) may have been so given, and this was no doubt the Bharadvāja named Vidathin above, because the fact that the Vāyu, Brahmānda and Bhāgavata confuse the adopted Bharadvāja with his son Vitatha strongly suggests that it was Vidathin who was adopted. These Puranas have confused the two Bharadvājas as they have apparently confused the names Vidathin and Vitatha.<sup>2</sup>

The introduction of the Maruts into this story illustrates how mythology apparently grew out of a misunderstanding of names. Br̥haspati lived in the kingdom of Marutta, as mentioned above, and was a preceptor among the Maruttas. The Br̥haddevatā (v, 102-3), misunderstanding this name through the brahmanic lack of the historical sense, says he was a preceptor among the Maruts. His son Bharadvāja was born there, among the Maruttas, and so also would have been his grandson (or great grandson) Vidathin Bharadvāja. When king Bharata lost his sons, Dīrghatamas, if his priest then (or one of his family, if he was then dead), might naturally have suggested that his own relative, the young Bharadvāja, might be adopted. So the youth was brought from the Maruttas and given in adoption to the king; and this act, by the same misunderstanding, was mythologized into the statement that the Maruts gave Bharadvāja to Bharata.<sup>3</sup>

From all these traditions then we get these synchronisms:—

Pauravas	Āngiratas (Āngiras) Uṣija		Vaiśalas Karandhamā Avikṣit	E. Anatas
	Ucathya	Br̥haspati	Śāṁvarta	Marutta
	Dīrghatamas	Bharadvāja		Bali
Dusyanta	Kakṣīvant
Bharata				Aṅga, &c.
Vidathin- Bharadvāja } Vitatha		{ Vidathin- Bharadvāja

<sup>3</sup> Similar and further confusion appears in Śatapatha Brāhm xiii, 5, 4, 6, which says the Maruts were Marutta Āvikṣita's guardsmen, Agni his chamberlain, and the Viśve Devās his counsellors: SBE, xliv, p. 397.

Putting together these results and those established earlier and arrived at independently, we have these synchronisms :—

Kāśi	Ayodhyā	Pauravas	Āngiratas
Divodāsa II			Ucathya
Pratardana	Sagara		Dirghatamas
Vatsa	Asamañjas		Bṛhaspati
Alarka	Āṁśumant	Dusyanta	Bharadvāja
		Bharata	Kaksīvant
			Vidathin

It thus appears that Bṛhaspati's son Bharadvāja was a younger contemporary of Divodāsa II of Kāśi. This entirely agrees with what has been mentioned incidentally above, that Bharadvāja was Divodāsa's purohita, a statement found both in the epic and in brahmanical books—thus confirming the two sets of synchronisms. Bṛhaspati and Bharadvāja belonged to the country of Vaiśāli, which was contiguous to the kingdom of Kāśi, and so Bharadvāja could quite naturally have become purohita in the latter; indeed the preceding remarks about all these Āngiratas show that they steadily migrated westwards.

Another synchronism is that well known connecting Daśaratha, king of Ayodhyā (Rāma's father), Sīradhvaja Janaka, king of Videha (Sītā's father), Daśaratha-Lomapāda,<sup>1</sup> king of Āṅga, the rishi Rṣyaśringa, and Pramati (or Sumati<sup>2</sup>), king of Vaiśāli. This is declared in the Rāmāyaṇa and is alluded to elsewhere.<sup>3</sup> That epic makes an Aśvapati, king of Kaikeya, also contemporary;<sup>4</sup> and this may be true, though it is not supported elsewhere.<sup>5</sup>

There are kṣatriya accounts of Brahmadatta and Bhīṣma, which lead to important synchronisms.

Those about Brahmadatta say this.<sup>6</sup> Anuha of the Nipa family, who was king of S. Pañcāla and reigned at Kāmpilya, married Kṛtī, daughter of Śuka,<sup>7</sup> and their son was Brahmadatta, called

<sup>6</sup> Hv 20, 1039-52, 1065-6; 23, 1241-63; 24, 1302-4. Mat 20, 21-6; 21, 11-16, 29-31. Pad v, 10, 67-71, 98-102, 115-17. MBh xii, 344, 13261-5. (Pad vi, 131, 93 speaks of a Brahmadatta of the Solar race in a fable, and Buddhist Jātakas of a Brahmadatta, king of Kāśi.)

Pitṛvartin. He was a contemporary and friend of Bhīṣma's grandfather (really great grandfather, as will appear), Pratīpa, the Kaurava king. Brahmadatta married Sannati,<sup>1</sup> daughter of a Devala.<sup>2</sup> A Jaigīṣavya<sup>3</sup> is said to have taught Brahmadatta, who by his instruction made a yoga-tantra.<sup>4</sup> His sons were Śaṅkha and Likhita (p. 69)<sup>5</sup> and his disciples are named.<sup>6</sup> Brahmadatta gave wealth to Śaṅkha.<sup>7</sup>

Pratīpa's successor according to the genealogies was Śantanu,<sup>8</sup> called Śantanu generally in the Mahābhārata and Puranas, and said to have been his son; but this is an instance of the omission of unimportant names, for both brahmanic and ordinary traditions assert that Śantanu had an elder brother Devāpi,<sup>9</sup> who was well known and is often alluded to.<sup>10</sup> This Devāpi is mentioned in Rigveda x, 98 and is there called Ārṣiṣena,<sup>11</sup> 'son of Rṣiṣena'. It is clear therefore that Devāpi and Śantanu were not sons of Pratīpa but grandsons, Rṣiṣena being father of Devāpi if not of Śantanu also, and that, as Devāpi declined the throne and Śantanu succeeded

<sup>9</sup> So the genealogies. Also Nirukta ii, 10: Brhadd vii, 155 to viii, 9: MBh i, 94, 3750-1; 95, 3797-8: v, 148, 5056-66.

<sup>10</sup> Vā 32, 39-42; 99, 437, 439: Bd iii, 74, 250, 252: Mat 273, 56, 58: Viṣ iv, 24, 45, 48: Bhāg iv, 22, 12, 17-18: all of which say he still lives and will restore the Paurava race in the new Kṛta age.

<sup>11</sup> The references to Ārṣiṣena in Vedic Index i, 378 require modification. No Ārṣiṣena is named in MBh i, 94, 3750-1. Ārṣiṣena and Devāpi in MBh ix, 40, 2281-2, and 41, 2285-94 are manifestly different persons as those passages show, Devāpi being this prince; but that Ārṣiṣena is there said to have lived in the Kṛta age (far earlier) and is no doubt the ancient prince Ārṣiṣena who became a brahman, as stated in Vā 92, 5-6; Bd iii, 67, 6; and also Hv 29, 1520; Br 11, 34. That Ārṣiṣena and Devāpi Ārṣiṣena must therefore be distinguished. Ārṣiṣena in Bd ii, 32, 105 and Vā 59, 97 (Adviṣena) would as a mantra-reciter be probably Devāpi. Ārṣiṣena in Vā 91, 116 and Bd iii, 66, 87 might be either.

Pratīpa, Rṣiṣenā had probably died early and so is omitted in the genealogies.<sup>1</sup> Bhīśma therefore as Śantanu's son was great grandson of Pratīpa.<sup>2</sup>

The foregoing data yield these synchronisms:—

Dvīmīḍhas	Kauravas	N. Pañcāla	S. Pañcāla
	Pratīpa		Brahmadatta
	(Rṣiṣenā)		Viśvaksena
Ugrāyudha	Śantanu		Udaksena
	Bhīśma	Prāśata	Bhallaṭa
			Janamejaya

There are many synchronisms in the story of the Pūṇḍavas in the Mahābhārata,<sup>7</sup> comprising the Pauravas from Śantanu to Arjuna's son Abhimanyu, grandson Parīkṣit II and great grandson Janamejaya III; Vasudeva, Kṛṣṇa and all his relations; Dama-ghoṣa, king of Cedi, his son Śiśupāla-Sunītha and grandson

<sup>1</sup> So also if Aulāna in verse 11 is Śantanu's patronymic (as suggested in Vedic Index i, 129, 378, and possibly rightly), for then Rṣiṣenā and Ulāna (?) would have been Pratīpa's sons and have both died in his lifetime; thus Devāpi and Śantanu would have been first cousins, and practically brothers, their fathers being dead and omitted.

<sup>2</sup> About Śantanu's time may be placed Duṣṭarītu Paumāsāyana, since he was a contemporary of Balhika Prātiṣṭiṣya (Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa xii, 9, 3, 1-3 and 13). He was king of the Sṛñjayas (Vedic Index ii, 371), i. e. of N. Pañcāla, and would fall in the gap between Jantu and Prāśata. Balhika or Vāhlīka, Prātiṣṭiṣya or Prātiṣṭiṣya son (descendant) of this Pratīpa, is often mentioned in the MBh; e. g. i, 95, 3797: v, 22, 693: vii, 157, 6932-4: xi, 22, 621.

<sup>6</sup> Hv 20, 1066-72, 1085-1112. So also the genealogies of the two dynasties. Mat 49, 59-68 confuses the story, and wrongly says Ugrāyudha was of the Solar race. Also MBh xii, 27, 808.

Dhr̥ṣṭaketu; Vṛddhaśarman and his son Dantavakra, kings of Karuṣa;<sup>1</sup> Ugrasena and Karīsa, kings of Mathurā; Jarāsandha and his son Sahadeva, kings of Magadha; Drupada, king of S. Pañcāla, his son Dhr̥ṣṭadyumna and grandson Dhr̥ṣṭaketu; Bṛhadbala, king of Ayodhyā; Karna and his son Vṛṣasena, kings of Aṅga; and many others. These are exhibited so far as they come into the table above.

Lastly, some time after the battle, there is the synchronism of the Paurava (Kuru) king Adhīśmaṅga, the Ayodhyā king Divākara and the Magadha king Senājit,<sup>2</sup> who will be noticed in chapter XV.

CHAPTER XIV

MINOR SYNCHRONISMS ESTABLISHED

NEXT may be considered a number of minor synchronisms, which connect only a few persons or relate to a brief space of time.

The earliest of these is that Yayāti's eldest brother Yati married Go, daughter of Kakutstha<sup>3</sup> or (better) Kākutstha.<sup>4</sup> He thus married Kakutstha's daughter or granddaughter, and Kakutstha can be none other than the early king of Ayodhyā, after whom various descendants were styled Kākutstha. Yayāti therefore should be placed one, or preferably two generations below Kakutstha.

There is a synchronism connecting the Ayodhyā and Druhyu dynasties. The Druhyus occupied the Panjab, and Māndhāṭ of Ayodhyā had a long war with the Druhyu king Aruddha<sup>5</sup> or Aṅgāra<sup>6</sup> and killed him.<sup>7</sup> The latter's successor was Gāndhāra, who gave his name to the Gāndhāra country.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>5</sup> So Vā 99, 7–8. Bd iii, 74, 7–8. Supported by Gar 139, 64; Viś iv, 17, 2; Bhāg ix, 23, 15; and Mat 48, 6.

<sup>6</sup> So Hv 32, 1837–8. Br 13, 149–50. Also MBh xii, 29, 981–2; but in vii, 62, 2281–2, seemingly as Sudhanvan.

<sup>7</sup> Referred to in MBh iii, 126, 10465, where he is called 'king of Gāndhāra' by anticipation.

<sup>8</sup> Vā 99, 9. Bd iii, 74, 9. Hv 32, 1839. Br 13, 150–1. Mat 48, 7.

Next are some synchronisms connected with Lopāmudrā. She was daughter of a king of Vidarbha,<sup>1</sup> and married Agastya.<sup>2</sup> The king is called Vaidarbha, 'son (or descendant) of Vidarbha'; and is named Nimi twice.<sup>3</sup> No king of this name occurs in the Vidarbha genealogy (chapter XII, Table), but he was obviously a son or near descendant of Vidarbha, and Nimi is probably a misreading of Bhīma,<sup>4</sup> another name of Vidarbha's son Kratha, or perhaps the name of another son. By Lopāmudrā's favour Alarka, king of Kāśī, grandson of Pratardana, had, it is said, a very long and prosperous reign.<sup>5</sup> Agastya and she were thus contemporary with Alarka, and were two or three generations below Vidarbha and Pratardana. These synchronisms harmonize with those deduced about those kings in chapter XIII.

The story about Lopāmudrā and Agastya goes on to make three kings, Śrutarvan, Bradhnaśva and Trasadasyu Paurukutsa their contemporaries,<sup>6</sup> but it gives no particulars about the first two and wrongly says Trasadasyu was of the Ikṣvāku race, for Trasadasyu the Aikṣvāku was far earlier than Sagara, who was a younger contemporary of Vidarbha as shown above. The synchronisms (infra) show that the later Trasadasyu Paurukutsa (p. 133), who was a Bhārata, was a contemporary of Rkṣa and a younger contemporary of Divodāsa's father Vadhryaśva. A king Śrutarvan Ārkṣa, 'son of Rkṣa,' is mentioned,<sup>7</sup> and the two Rkṣas are probably the same.<sup>8</sup> Hence the Bhārata Trasadasyu, Vadhryaśva and Śrutarvan were practically contemporaries, and Böhtlingk and Roth's conjecture that Bradhnaśva is an error for Vadhryaśva seems right. A synchronism then inferred from the Rigveda has been

wrongly attached to Agastya and Lopāmudrā,<sup>1</sup> who were considerably earlier as shown, and the two Trasadasyus have been confused. This is a spurious synchronism, a brahmanical addition to glorify Agastya, and reveals the lack of the historical sense.

Sagara was a younger contemporary of Vidarbha as shown above. It is stated in the story of Nala that Bhīma, king of Vidarbha, and Virabahu, king of Cedi, were contemporaries,<sup>2</sup> and the latter's son Subāhu and R̥tuparna, king of Ayodhyā, were contemporaries.<sup>3</sup> This agrees entirely with the genealogies, for they make Bhīmaratha (of which Bhīma there is the shortened form) tenth successor of Vidarbha and R̥tuparna tenth successor of Sagara, the latter being a younger contemporary of the former.

Another group of synchronisms may be collected from the Rigveda, though falling mostly outside the purview of the genealogies. Divodāsa Atithigva was king of North Pañcāla.<sup>4</sup> His son Indrota, R̥kṣa's son, and Aśvamedha's son Pūtakratu were contemporaries.<sup>5</sup> Pūtakratu's son was Dasyave-Vṛka,<sup>6</sup> a prince who was also a rishi.<sup>7</sup> Aśvamedha was contemporary with Trasadasyu Paurukutsya, who was apparently a Pūru king,<sup>8</sup> so Trasadasyu was son of Purukutsa;<sup>9</sup> and Purukutsa was son of Girikṣit and grandson of Durgaha.<sup>10</sup> Trasadasyu had a son Tr̥kṣi.<sup>11</sup> Sobhari Kānya was contemporary with Trasadasyu.<sup>12</sup> Contemporary with Divodāsa was Prastoka,<sup>13</sup> who was a Sāñjaya,<sup>14</sup> that is, a descendant (not son) of Sāñjaya, the brother of Mudgala, who were Bhāratas; contemporary with Prastoka was Abhyāvartin Cāyamāna;<sup>15</sup> and Aśvamedha was a descendant of Bharata.<sup>16</sup> These two princes also probably belonged to the petty kingdoms descended from Mudgala's brothers. The R̥kṣa mentioned above was probably the king of Hastināpura, who is called in the genealogies son of Ajamīdha and father of Sam-varāṇa, but the table of genealogies shows that there were many generations, and that son means descendant and father means ancestor. From these data we get these synchronisms:—

Pauravas		N. Pañcāla		Kāñvas
Bhāratas		Mudgalas	Sṛñjayas
		Durgaha
		Girikṣit
		Purukutsa	Vadhryaśva
Rkṣa	Āśvamedha	Trasādasyu	Divodāsa	Prastoka
	Pūtakratu	Trkṣi	Indrota	Sobhari
	Dasyave-
	Vṛka

There is a story that connects the Yādavas and Rāma of Ayodhyā. It is prefaced by a spurious genealogy noticed in chapter X, but the material passage<sup>1</sup> appears to contain genuine tradition because it is corroborated elsewhere and explains the name of the country Śūrasena. It gives these descendants of the great Yādava king Madhu,<sup>2</sup> namely, Mādhava, his son Satvata, his son Bhīma and his son Andhaka, and these tally with the genealogical version Satvant, Sātvata, and Andhaka. It says Bhīma Sātvata was contemporary with Rāma; Rāma's brother Śatrughna killed the Yādava Lavaṇa, cut down the forest Madhuvana and built the city Mathurā there; when Rāma and his brothers died, Bhīma recovered the city; and Andhaka reigned there contemporary with Rāma's son Kuśa at Ayodhyā. The genealogies say that Śatrughna killed the Mādhava Lavaṇa, went to Madhuvana, built Mathurā and reigned there with his two sons Subāhu and Śūrasena.<sup>3</sup> Here then we have Satvant and Bhīma contemporary with Rāma, and Andhaka with Kuśa.

Another version<sup>4</sup> amplifies what the genealogies say with some mistaken embellishments, as that Lavaṇa was son, instead of descendant, of Madhu, and that Madhuvana was in Ayodhyā territory, whereas South Pañcāla separated them. The Rāmāyaṇa

<sup>3</sup> Vā 88, 185-6. Bd iii, 63, 186-7. Rām vii, 62, 6 and Viś iv, 4, 46, wrongly calling Lavaṇa a Rākṣasa; and so also Bhāg ix, 11, 14; Śatrughna's killing Lavaṇa also in Ag 11, 6-7; Raghuv xv, 2-30; Pad vi, 271, 9; Var 178, 1.

gives a third version, similar but largely amplified and brahmanized with various mistakes.<sup>1</sup> Mathurā was the capital of the Śūrasena country; the country appears to have obtained its name from Satrughna's son Śurasena,<sup>2</sup> and Andhaka's descendants reigned there down to Ugrasena and Kāṁsa; so the second version says.

Andhaka's brother Bhajamāna married two daughters of Śrījaya.<sup>3</sup> Nothing is said to identify this Śrījaya, but the reference suggests he was well known, and the best known Śrījaya was the king of N. Pañcāla. The genealogical table framed according to the synchronisms established shows that Śrījaya of N. Pañcāla must have reigned about this time, and as Andhaka's and Bhajamāna's father Bhīma Sātvata reigned at Mathurā as just shown, a marriage alliance between the two neighbouring dynasties would be quite natural. There can be little doubt then in identifying these two Śrījayas. Combining then all these particulars we have these synchronisms:—

N. Pañcāla	Yādavas	Ayodhyā
Srījaya	Satvant	Rāma
	Bhīma Sātvata	Śatruघna
	Bhajamāna, Andhaka	Śūrasena
		Kuśa <sup>4</sup>

This is corroborated by another allusion. In two lists of royal munificence to brahmans it is said king Śatadyumna gave a splendid furnished house to the brahman Maudgalya,<sup>5</sup> descendant of king Mudgala, of N. Pañcāla (chapter IX). King Mudgala therefore was earlier than Śatadyumna. The only Śatadyumna mentioned was a king of Videha, Siradhvaja's second successor. Siradhvaja was Rāma's father-in-law (ante), so Śatadyumna would have been Rāma's younger contemporary and therefore (according to the synchronisms just set out) a contemporary of Śrījaya of N. Pañcāla. Śrījaya was Mudgala's fourth or fifth successor, and the Maudgalya brahmans would have been established three or four generations in Śatadyumna's time—thus entirely harmonizing with the above allusion.

<sup>2</sup> So also Rām vii, 70, 6-9 may imply. Ig i, 68, 19 suggests a different explanation, that it was named after an earlier Śūrasena, a son of the Haihaya Arjuna Kārtavīrya; but no other authority supports that, and the Haihaya territory appears to have lain farther south, as mentioned ante.

There is a synchronism between Divodāsa's and Rksa's descendants. Divodāsa's fifth successor Sudās (Sudāsa, chapter IX) defeated his foes on the Jumna and again defeated Pūru and others in battle on the river Paruṣṇī (modern Ravi);<sup>1</sup> hence he must have driven Pūru out of the Paurava kingdom of Hastināpura first to the Jumna and then as far west as the Ravi. Tradition says that the Paurava Samvarana was driven out of Hastināpura by a Pañcāla king and took refuge many years near the river Sindhu, but afterwards with a Vasiṣṭha's aid recovered his kingdom and established a lordship over all kṣatriya princes,<sup>2</sup> which means he subdued Pañcāla. The genealogies say Sudāsa's kingdom declined after his death,<sup>3</sup> and the Rigveda shows that Somaka was less opulent than Sudās.<sup>4</sup> Moreover a Vasiṣṭha was Sudās's priest,<sup>5</sup> but there are no hymns by any Vasiṣṭha in honour of his successors. There was also a long gap between Jantu and Prṣata, during which N. Pañcāla was dominated by Hastināpura. It is clear then that Sudās drove Samvarana out, and that Samvarana and his son Kuru conquered Sahadeva or more probably Somaka.<sup>6</sup> Hence Samvarana was a younger contemporary of Sudās and Kuru of Somaka.

Kavaṣa lived in Sudās's reign and was drowned apparently at Sudās's battle with the ten kings; he was old (vriddha) then and famous (sruta).<sup>7</sup> He was no doubt Kavaṣa Ailūṣa,<sup>8</sup> the reputed author of hymn x, 33, because that is in praise of king Kuruśravaṇa Trāsadasavyava, and that king, as a near descendant of Trasadasyu who was a contemporary of Divodāsa (ante), would have lived about the time of Divodāsa's fourth and fifth successors Cyavana and Sudās. The two Kavaṣas thus lived at the same time and were no doubt the same rishi. He was thus contemporary with Saṁvaraṇa. Further, Tura Kāvaṣeya consecrated Janamejaya Pārikṣita and was his purohita.<sup>1</sup> Tura was by his patronymic a descendant of Kavaṣa, and Janamejaya was Janamejaya II, son of Parikṣit I who was Saṁvaraṇa's grandson. They would thus have been contemporary. Kavaṣa appears to have been on Saṁvaraṇa's side, and his near descendant Tura consecrated Saṁvaraṇa's great grandson Janamejaya.

King Kr̄ta or Kr̄ti of the Dvīmidha line was, as all the passages which mention him say,<sup>2</sup> the disciple of Hiranyanābha or Hiranyanābhi Kausalya, and made twenty-four saṁhitās of sāmans; they were the 'eastern sāmans', and the chanters of them were called Kārtas or Kārtis after him. Hiranyanābha was a king of Kosala,<sup>3</sup> but his position is confused in three passages, which place him five generations after Vyāsa<sup>4</sup>; and that is wrong, because it would make him one of the 'future' kings after the Bhārata battle (chapter III), but he was not one of them<sup>5</sup> and the genealogies fix his position clearly as No. 83 in the Ayodhyā dynasty;<sup>6</sup> and because it is incredible that, after the brahmans had established the Vedic schools, two kings could have been such authorities on the sāmans. Kr̄ta was one step below Hiranyanābha.

Hiranyanābha as Kr̄ta's teacher was learned in the sāmans, and they constructed the 'eastern sāmans'. They lived before Vyāsa, but when Sukarman Jaimini taught Pauṣyañji the Sāmaveda, Pauṣyañji taught his disciples 500 (sic) saṁhitās of sāmans, and they were known as the 'northern sāman chanters'. Then notice had to be taken of the older 'eastern sāman chanters', and they had to be brought into the Vedic schools, so Hiranyanābha was assigned as a second disciple to Sukarman,<sup>1</sup> and is said to have constructed 500 sāṁhitās also.<sup>2</sup> This erroneous harmonizing was added to the Ayodhyā genealogy, and it is there stated<sup>3</sup> that Hiranyanābha was the disciple of Jaimini's grandson (Brahmānda says, Pausyañji) in the eastern sāmans, learnt 500 sāṁhitās from him and also taught a Yājñavalkya yoga.

Next may be noticed various data which do not yield synchronisms proper, yet help to indicate the position of kings and rishis. They consist generally of brief allusions. Not every such allusion is worthy of consideration, but where the same fact is referred to in various passages, the consensus becomes important. Some of them are marital notices and the Paurava genealogy in the Mahābhārata (i, 95, 3764 ff.) goes so far as to name the wife of every king in it, but it is not wholly trustworthy, as shown in chapter IX, and it is highly improbable that every queen's name could be remembered. Caution must also be shown in dealing with personal names, especially of rishis, and patronymics, as pointed out above. Thus Duṣyanta the Paurava married Śakuntalā, daughter of Viśvāmitra, as abundant passages declare;<sup>4</sup> but the position of the first and great Viśvāmitra has been defined above by copious tradition as earlier than Duṣyanta's period; hence she was not his daughter, but the daughter of a Viśvāmitra who was one of his near descendants. The genealogies of Ayodhyā say Satyavrata Triśaṅku married a Kaikeya princess,<sup>5</sup> and this statement may be accepted because his story has been handed down in a kṣatriya ballad (p. 59). Hence the Kaikeya dynasty had come into existence before his time; and therefore according to the genealogies all the other Panjab kingdoms also, the Śivas, Mādras, Sauvīras, &c. (chapter IX). Hence it is possible that his son Hariścandra's queen was a Śaivya princess, as the Mārkaṇḍeya says (7, 35; &c.), though its story is a fable. Jyāmagha the Yādava, who was later, married a Śaivya princess.<sup>6</sup>

CHAPTER XV

THE FOUR AGES, CHRONOLOGY AND DATE OF THE BHĀRATA BATTLE

TIME that is treated as historical in tradition is divided into four ages (yuga), the Kṛta (or Dharma or Satya), Tretā, Dvāpara and Kali (or Tisya), and this reckoning appears to have an historical basis, though later speculations elaborated it into an amazing yet precise scheme of cosmogony. That scheme does not render this reckoning of four ages unworthy of attention, because the genealogies refer to them sometimes, and it appears that they did correspond to certain periods.

It is noteworthy that this theory of the four ages did not apply to the whole world. It is declared repeatedly that these ages prevailed in India (Bhārata varṣa),<sup>1</sup> and the descriptions of the other continents (varṣa) say nothing about the ages occurring there,<sup>2</sup> and portray conditions incompatible therewith. The four ages therefore concerned India only, and it is declared that they prevailed only in India.<sup>3</sup> The position of these ages in the seventy-one four-age periods which made up a manvantara<sup>4</sup> in the cosmological scheme was therefore a later elaboration. The early idea was that the four ages were a peculiarity of India alone, hence obviously the explanation of them must be sought for in the conditions of ancient India.

It is a commonplace of history that great wars, conquests or political changes put an end to one age and usher in a new age, or mark the transition from one to the other; and so the Mohammedans and the British introduced new ages into India. It is natural therefore to surmise that similar changes occurred and were so regarded in ancient India, and indications of this are found in tradition.<sup>1</sup> The end of the Dvāpara age was admittedly marked by the Bhūrata battle, for it is declared that the battle occurred in the interval (sandhyā) between the Dvāpara and Kali ages;<sup>2</sup> but this was afterwards modified,<sup>3</sup> and the beginning of the Kali age was fixed at the passing away of the great heroes of that battle, Kṛṣṇa and the Pāṇḍavas, in order apparently to obviate the repugnant idea that the deified Kṛṣṇa lived into the Kali age, according to the express statement that that age began immediately he died.<sup>4</sup> The broad fact however is clear, that the Dvāpara age closed with that battle, and that the Kali age began with the changes in the political condition of N. India that ensued.

Tradition speaks also of an earlier time of great destruction and misery, when the ksatriyas were well-nigh exterminated and North India was plunged into grievous calamities,<sup>5</sup> and brahmanic fable attributes that to Rāma Jāmadagnya, though ksatriya tradition shows it really occurred in consequence of the devastating raids of the Haihayas, from whom Sagara delivered the land and restored peace (chapter XXIV). That time may naturally have marked the transition from one age to another. There is no later similar period of calamity that suggests itself as a change of age, but tradition treats Rāma's destruction of Rāvaṇa and the Rākṣasas of the Dekhan and Ceylon as an epoch of signal vengeance upon evil foes.<sup>6</sup> The table of genealogies in chapter XII comprises all the kings from the beginning of the Kṛta to the end of the Dvāpara age, and shows that Sagara's destruction of the Haihayas and Rāma's reign divide the whole period into three parts of not very unequal length, which might well constitute three ages. This arrangement produces a scheme of four ages which is sensible, though exactitude cannot of course be expected.

This division accords with what tradition says about the transition from one age to another. Kṛṣṇa lived at the time of the Bhārata battle and the close of the Dvāpara age.<sup>1</sup> Rāma Dāśarathi lived in the interval between the Tretā and Dvāpara ages.<sup>2</sup> To Rāma Jāmadagnya is assigned the same position, and the references say he lived in the Tretā age,<sup>3</sup> and smote the kṣatriyas in the interval between the Tretā and Dvāpara ages.<sup>4</sup> But this was Rāma Dāśarathi's position, and that particularization is clearly wrong, for Rāma Jāmadagnya was avowedly prior as shown by the synchronisms in chapter XIII, and the allegation that he destroyed all kṣatriyas off the earth twenty-one times (really the long-continued Haihaya devastations) is wholly incompatible with the story of Rāma Dāśarathi. It is obvious that Rāma Jāmadagnya belonged to the interval between the Kṛta and Tretā ages, when in fact the Haihayas had their dominion, and the references should be to the Kṛta age and that interval. The Kṛta age then ended with the destruction of the Haihayas; the Tretā began approximately with Sagara and ended with Rāma Dāśarathi's destruction of the Rākṣasas; and the Dvāpara began with his reinstatement at Ayodhyā and ended with the Bhārata battle: so that, taking the numbers in the table of genealogies, the division is approximately thus, the Kṛta Nos. 1-40, the Tretā Nos. 41-65, and the Dvāpara Nos. 66-95.

These considerations show how the belief arose that Viṣṇu became incarnate when conditions on earth had become evil, in order to destroy wickedness and re-establish righteousness,<sup>5</sup> for his three chief alleged historical incarnations were, the earliest Rāma Jāmadagnya, the second Rāma Dāśarathi, and the last Kṛṣṇa. Such statements are brahmanical, and historical consistency cannot be expected in all.<sup>6</sup> The misstatement of Rāma Jāmadagnya's position arose probably from the notion that the Kṛta age was one of unblemished righteousness.

There are allusions to the ages sometimes in the genealogies, and these (when without the elaboration of the ages which will be noticed) appear to be sometimes right, and tend to show that there was in kṣatriya tradition some memory of the chronological position of certain important events. Thus king Bāhu of Ayodhyā lived in the Dharma (Kṛta) age,<sup>1</sup> which agrees with the position, No. 39, determined for him. Karandhama of the Vaiśāla dynasty reigned at the beginning of the Tretā age,<sup>2</sup> and his twelfth successor Trnabindu reigned at the third mouth of that age,<sup>3</sup> which appears to mean the beginning of the third quarter of it: and the positions, Nos. 38 and 52, determined for them practically agree with the approximate limits assigned to that age above. But most such allusions occur in stories and discourses, often brahmanic, and are sometimes right but more often wrong.<sup>4</sup> There is an inclination to assign events to the Tretā age,<sup>5</sup> and the expression Tretā-yuga<sup>6</sup> means at times little or nothing more than 'once upon a time'. Such statements are generally worthless for chronological purposes.

It is unnecessary here to pursue this matter into the later fully developed theory of the yugas and manvantaras, wherein 71 four-age periods (catur-yuga) made up a manvantara. It was a fanciful brahmanical elaboration; and one feature in it is that the present time is the Kali age in the 28th four-age period of the Vaivasvata manvantara, so the events of traditional history were sometimes distributed among those 28 periods.<sup>7</sup> Thus a pretentious passage declares<sup>8</sup>—Datta Ātreyā as Viṣṇu's fourth incarnation and Mārkandeya lived in the 10th Tretā age (i. e. in the Tretā age of the 10th four-age period); Māndhāṭṛ as his fifth incarnation<sup>9</sup> and Utathya lived in the 15th Tretā; Rāma Jāmadagnya as his sixth and Viśvāmitra lived in the 19th Tretā; Daśaratha's son Rāma as his seventh and Vasiṣṭha lived in the 24th age<sup>1</sup>; Vyāsa as his eighth with Jatukarṇya, and Kṛṣṇa as his ninth with Brahma-Gārgya lived in the 28th Dvāpara.<sup>2</sup> Such assignments sometimes observe some chronological consistency, often they are erratic, and in any case, being brahmanical notions lacking the historical sense, they are unreliable.

As the Bhārata battle marked the end of the Dvāpara age and is a great landmark, it is well to reach some estimate of its probable date.<sup>3</sup>

Candragupta began to reign in or about 322 B.C. He was preceded by the nine Nandas,<sup>4</sup> Mahāpadma and his eight sons, who are said to have enjoyed the earth one hundred years. To Mahāpadma are assigned 88 years and to his sons 12 years. The best reading says, not that he reigned 88 years, but that he would be (that is, lived) 88 years; and a hundred years for the joint lives of him and his sons accord with an ordinary genealogical estimate, and are not unreasonable, as his life was long. It is improbable in the circumstances of that time that he could have gained the throne of Magadha until he was grown up, or, say, 20 years old at least.<sup>5</sup> The reigns of the nine Nandas would then be reduced to 80 years, and we may reckon that they began approximately at (322 + 80) 402 B.C.

The next question to consider is the time between Mahāpadma's inauguration and the Bhārata battle. For this three sets of data are alleged. First, there reigned in Magadha during that time 22 Bāhradrathas, 5 Pradyotas and 10 Śiśunāgas, and the total of all their reigns is (940 + 138 + 330) 1408 years, while the totals of the durations of the dynasties vary from (1000 + 138 + 360) 1498 to (723 + 52 + 163) 938 years according as we take all the highest or all the lowest figures.<sup>6</sup> Secondly, it is said that the period from Mahāpadma's inauguration back to Parikṣit's birth, which occurred

soon after the battle,<sup>1</sup> was 1050 (or 1015) years.<sup>2</sup> These figures are so discrepant that it is clear no reliable tradition has survived in them. It cannot be said that any one of them is more trustworthy than the others. No calculation can be based on all of them combined, and to make computations from one or other of them is purely random work.<sup>3</sup> Besides they are all demonstrably wrong. From the Bhārata battle to Mahāpadma there were 30 Paurava kings (for Yudhiṣṭhīra must be reckoned in) and 29 Aikṣvākus (excluding Siddhārtha, i. e. Buddha, who did not reign), beside the 37 Māgadha kings; hence on a reckoning of the kings as 30, the foregoing figures, 1408, &c., give average reigns of 47, 50, 31 and 35 years respectively, which are all impossible when tested by real historical averages as will be shown. Those figures therefore cannot be relied on. The third set of data is that Mahāpadma exterminated all kṣatriyas, and that until then there reigned contemporaneously for the same length of time 24 Aikṣvākus, 27 Pañcālas, 24 Kāśīs, 28 Haihayas, 32 Kalingas, 25 Aśmakas, 36 Kurus, 28 Maithilas, 28 Śūrasenās and 20 Vitihotras.<sup>4</sup> Here we have safer ground, for the (names and so) number of kings in a dynasty was a much simpler matter and more easily remembered than figures of the lengths of reigns and dynasties; and this information about ten contemporary dynasties eliminates peculiarities and extravagances about single dynasties and enables us to make prudent calculations by means of averages of all ten. The investigation will proceed on these lines.

It would have taken Mahāpadma some time to conquer all those kingdoms, the nearer earlier and the more distant later; and it will not be far out if we strike a mean, say, of 20 years after his accession for their destruction,<sup>5</sup> and so fix the year (402–20) 382 B.C. for their mean termination. That list of contemporary kings can be tested as regards its period and the number of kings. The dynastic account gives the Paurava, Aikṣvāku and Bārhadratha kings from the time of the battle, but the prophetic portion of it starts from the point of time when the Paurava king Adhisīmakṛṣṇa, the Aikṣvāku Divākara and the Bārhadratha Senājit were reigning contemporaneously, for it is clearly stated in the Paurava list that the future kings were 25, Adhisīmakṛṣṇa and his 24 successors, and in the Bārhadratha list that they were 16, Senājit and his 15 successors; the predecessors in both cases not being so reckoned. Hence in these three dynasties that point of time is the real initial point throughout and the extermination by Mahāpadma is the final point.

The number of kings can be tested as regards the Aikṣvākus and the Kurus who were the Pauravas. The Aikṣvāku list names 25 future kings from Divākara (omitting Siddhārtha), and the list of contemporary kings says 24 Aikṣvākus, so that the two agree practically. The Paurava-Kuru list names 25 future kings, and the contemporary list says 36; but another well-attested reading in the latter says 26,<sup>1</sup> and it was pointed out<sup>2</sup> that, because of the ease with which tr and v might be confused, 'in many cases either [20 or 30] may be read as other data may indicate, irrespective of the weight of the MSS.' This reading 26 is no doubt the true reading, because it accords better with the other numbers in the contemporary list and agrees practically with the 25 in the former list. The practical agreement in these two dynasties, the only cases we can test, indicates that the contemporary list is also reckoned from the same initial point as the three detailed dynasties.

According to the contemporary list then there reigned between those initial and final points, 24 Aikṣvākus, 27 Pañcālas, 24 Kāśis, 28 Haihayas, 32 Kaliṅgas, 25 Aśmakas, 26 Kurus (Pauravas), 28 Maithilas, 23 Śūrasenas and 20 Vīthotras,<sup>3</sup> that is 257 kings in ten kingdoms, or a mean of 26 kings. For these 26 then we must allow reigns of medium length, and the question is, at how many years should a medium length be reckoned? The longest average of reigns occurred among the 20 Vīthotras, the shortest among the 32 Kaliṅgas. Thus 20 long reigns = 32 short reigns = 26 medium reigns, whence we obtain the proportion—longest average : shortest average : medium average :: 26 : 16½ : 20. I have examined 14 series of from 20 to 30 kings in various eastern and western countries ; the longest average just exceeded 24 years in one case, the shortest was about 12, and the average of all was 19 ; but the average was higher in western countries and lower in eastern countries. Hence as a medium average for these contemporary eastern dynasties we must take something less than 19, and 18 years will be a fair and even liberal estimate. The duration of these ten contemporary kingdoms then would be  $26 \times 18$ , that is, 468 years, and their period would be from 850 to 382 B. C. when Mahāpadma exterminated them.

<sup>3</sup> It is said the Vīthotras had passed away before the Pradyotas began, DKA, pp. 18, 68. If so, they should be omitted; yet the reckoning here would not be materially modified.

In this calculation the Magadha kings have not been included, since they are omitted from the contemporary list, and the date 850 B. C. may now be tested with reference to them. From Senājīt (850) till Mahāpadma overthrew the Śiśunāgas (402) reigned 16 Bāhradrathas, 5 Pradyotas and 10 Śiśunāgas ; that is, 448 years are allowed for 31 reigns—an average of  $14\frac{1}{2}$  years. This lower average is quite probable because of the violence that overthrew those dynasties, and it is about the average I have found in eastern dynasties. The above estimate therefore of 18 years for a medium peaceful reign appears just, and the date 850 B. C. is highly probable.

This year 850 would be the approximate mean date of the beginnings of the reigns of Adhisīmakṛṣṇa, Divākara and Senājīt ; and therefore the standpoint during their reigns, dividing the 'past' from the 'future' in the prophetic account,<sup>1</sup> would be a few years later, say, about 840 B. C.

To get the time of the Bhārata battle, we must add the kings who preceded those three kings, namely, 5 Pauravas (for Yudhiṣṭhīra's reign must be included), 4 Aikṣvākus and 6 Bāhradrathas, that is, a mean of 5, and here for so short a period the medium reign probably was longer, say 20 years.<sup>2</sup> Hence we must add (5  $\times$  20) 100 years, and the date of the battle may be fixed approximately as (850 + 100) 950 B. C.<sup>3</sup> This reckoning has avoided special figures or unique statements, except in the one case of the Nandas where no other course is available; and has proceeded upon general averages (1) of the number of kings belonging to 11 contemporaneous dynasties and (2) of the lengths of reigns computed from the reliable data of 14 historical dynasties in other countries; thus it has eliminated all peculiar features and is a reasonable general approximation.<sup>1</sup>

If we should seek to make an estimate of the ages before the battle, it would be prudent to take a smaller length for the average reign, because only one line, that of Ayodhyā, is practically complete, while there are gaps in the other dynasties, so that there is little scope for taking medium averages of all the dynasties and eliminating peculiarities. The lowest average mentioned above, 12 years, therefore would be a sounder estimate. Since however it is said that insignificant kings have been omitted from the genealogies (p. 89), it may be contended that the average should be increased to compensate for lost kings, say, 13 or  $13\frac{1}{2}$  years per step in the table in chapter XII; but the uncertainty and peculiarity in such details require caution, and it would be more prudent to adhere to 12 years as the average. To contend for immense antiquity for the earliest ages is discredited by the historical sense; and to push back the antiquity of those ages to vast figures is to weaken pro tanto the trustworthiness of tradition about them when everything depended on memory alone.<sup>2</sup>

Another consequence of such dating is to prolong also the ages before the battle; and to put back the antiquity of any event is to weaken the trustworthiness of tradition about it.

CHAPTER XVI

BRAHMAN FAMILIES AND CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE OF RISHIS

VĀMŚAS, or so-called genealogies, of the chief brahman families are given in some of the Puranas,<sup>1</sup> and shorter notices or portions are found in others<sup>2</sup> and in the Mahābhārata.<sup>3</sup> These all belong to the present Vaivasvata manvantara. Besides them somewhat similar genealogies assigned to the Svāyambhuva manvantara are mentioned in some Puranas,<sup>4</sup> and are mainly mythical, though they introduce the names of some rishis well known in the present age. Professedly however they do not belong to the present age and may be put aside.

These brahman genealogies present a remarkable contrast with those of the royal dynasties. It is the difference between a genuine genealogy and one subsequently compiled; between a genealogy that grew contemporaneously with the prolongation of the dynasty, and a genealogy that was pieced together by some compiler out of such materials as he could collect and understand in after times. The bulk of the royal genealogies consists of persons who are named nowhere else; and it would be impossible to construct them out of the notices of kings which occur elsewhere. The brahman vāmśas are defective in all their features. They do not set out continuous descent except occasionally for a very few steps. They are often manifestly incomplete where they give such descents, because they may assign only a few steps to periods in which the royal genealogies place many kings, as will be seen in the pedigree from Śakti to Vyāsa among the Vasiṣṭhas. Where they do set out copious names, the names form merely a list without any genealogical connexion.

<sup>4</sup> Bd ii, 11. Vā 10, 29 f.; 28; 31, 16-18. Viṣ i, 10, 2-14. Lg i, 5, 24-6, 38-49; 70, 270 f. Kūr i, 13. Märk 52.

There is little truly genealogical matter in these vāṁśas which cannot be found in various passages elsewhere. They mix up gods and mythological persons with real rishis, as will be seen.

So far as tradition indicates, the ancient rishis kept practically no genealogies. Brahmanical books contain lists of the rishis through whom certain teaching was handed down (p. 4), but no lists of natural descents. Spiritual pedigrees exist, natural pedigrees are wanting. It was one of the duties of the sūtas (p. 15) to preserve the genealogies of rishis as well as of kings, and presumably they observed it as far as they were able, but the task must have been well-nigh impossible, inasmuch as the rishis generally dwelt in secluded hermitages, many of their descendants were of no note, their relations and families were not matters of public interest and report, and their gotras multiplied unmanageably. Rishi genealogies could never have been as copious as the dynastic genealogies; certainly, if they ever were so, they were not transmitted so sedulously, for they do not exist now.

The brahman families claimed descent from mythical rishis, of whom there were eight, Bhṛgu, Āṅgiras, Marīci (whose son was Kaśyapa), Atri, Vasiṣṭha, Pulastya, Pulaha and Kratu. They are called mind-born sons of Brahmā,<sup>1</sup> but fable devised another origin for them with fanciful etymologies of their names.<sup>2</sup> It appears in various places with variations, but the general explanation is this. Brahmā offered a sacrifice and Bhṛgu came into existence from it, next Āṅgiras, and then the others, and Kavi is also named sometimes as the same as Bhṛgu and sometimes as distinct. Śiva, who had the form of Varuṇa, took Bhṛgu as his son, hence Bhṛgu and the Bhārgavas were famed as Vāruṇa; Agni took Āṅgiras, hence Āṅgiras was known as Agneya; and one account says Brahmā took Kavi, who was therefore known as Brāhma, but adds that Śiva as Varuṇa took him, so that Kavi was also Vāruṇa. The account says Bhṛgu begot seven sons, Āṅgiras eight and Kavi eight; the sons named were not sons but descendants in various degrees.

<sup>1</sup> e.g. Vā 9, 68-9; but differently, 99-104. The number of the mind-born sons varies. Brahmā the Pitāmaha created them, so they were called paitāmahaṛśis, Mat 171, 28.

<sup>2</sup> Vā 65, 21, 35-48. Bd iii, 1, 20, 35-47. Mat 195, 5-11. MBh xiii, 85, 4121-5, 4145-54, 4163. Brhadd v, 97-101, quoted by Vedārth as introduction to Rigv v. Alluded to, Vā 1, 128; 30, 76: Bd ii, 13, 83-4. Cf. MBh i, 5, 869-70; 66, 2605.

Of the eight rishi progenitors, however, the last three, Pulastya, Pulaha and Kratu, produced no true brahman families, as will be explained,<sup>1</sup> and only from the five others did genuine brahman families claim descent. But it was known that these five families were not all of equal antiquity, because it is said, 'Four original families (mūla-gotra) came into existence, Āngiras, Kaśyapa, Vasistha and Bhṛgu; through action (karmataḥ) other families were produced'<sup>2</sup>—omitting Atri. Tradition supports the later origin of the Ātreyas, and indicates that the Kūśyapas also began later (see chapter XX), so that the *ī*ly families whose existence is carried back in tradition to the earliest antiquity are the Bhārgavas and Vasisthas, and perhaps the Āngiratas. Still the general allegation came to be that the ancestors of all the families were the mythical primaeva rishis. In the following chapters all these families will be discussed, so far as they purport to have an historical connexion; and here the ground may be cleared by noticing briefly the mythological allegations about certain primaeva rishis in these families. It is said that Pulastya's offspring were Rākṣasas, Vānaras, Kinnaras and Yaksas;<sup>3</sup> that Pulaha's offspring were Kimpurusas, Piśācas, goblins, lions, tigers and other animals;<sup>4</sup> and that Kratu had no wife or child, and remained celibate, according to most accounts,<sup>5</sup> but according to other accounts the Vālakhilyas were his offspring.<sup>6</sup>

The most noticeable allegations are made regarding 'Bṛhaspati' son of 'Āngiras'. It seems from an examination of the statements that three primary Bṛhaspatis must be distinguished. First, the Bṛhaspati who had a wife Tārā; Soma seduced her and had a son Budha by her.<sup>7</sup> Here Bṛhaspati means the planet,<sup>8</sup> and this story appears to be an astronomical myth about Jupiter, the Moon, Mercury, &c. Secondly, the Br̥haspati who is called the priest or guru or ācārya of the gods in their war with the asuras (Daityas and Dānavas), whose powerful priest was the Bhārgava Uśanas-Śukra.<sup>1</sup> Both these rishis are assigned a chronological position in that that war is placed in Yayāti's reign and Yayāti married Śukra's daughter Devayānī (p. 86).<sup>2</sup> Thirdly, the historical rishi Br̥haspati who has been discussed above (chapter XIII). It may be added, fourthly, that the descendants of this last are often undistinguished from him as 'Br̥haspatis'.

The third Br̥haspati was an Āṅgirasa, the first of course was not, and it is not clear whether the second was such or not. But they are constantly confused, especially in the later stories, as regards both their functions and the epithet 'Āṅgiras'.<sup>3</sup> So the first, the planet,<sup>4</sup> is called in the story of Tārā and in some Puranas the guru of the gods<sup>5</sup> and an Āṅgiras.<sup>6</sup> The first and second are further confused and identified in astronomical accounts, and so the planet is styled the ācārya of the gods and also Āṅgiras,<sup>7</sup> where Āṅgiras seems to be borrowed, if not from the second, yet certainly from the third Br̥haspati; for it seems probable that the second was not an Āṅgiras in the sense of Āṅgiras as a gotra, but may have got that appellation through confusion with the third, since no Āṅgirasas appear definitely until far later in Karandhama's reign (chapter XIII). Further, attributes of the second are erroneously applied to the third, as where the latter is called the priest of the gods.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>4</sup> The epithet br̥hattejas is often applied to 'Br̥haspati'. Apparently it properly belonged to the planet (Mat 128, 48: Vā 53, 81: Bd ii, 24, 89: Lg i, 61, 18), and was afterwards transferred to the other Br̥haspatis in the confusion; e. g. to the third Br̥haspati (MBh i, 104, 4180), to 'Br̥haspati' father of Samyu (Vā 71, 48–9).

Among the Bhārgavas Bhṛgu and Kavi are purely mythical, but as regards Uśanas-Śukra, who is called their son, it must be noted that Uśanas and Śukra were names of the planet Venus also, and the two must be distinguished. The rishi always appears as the great priest of the Daityas and Dānavas (chapter XVII) and as the antagonist of the second Bṛhaspati with the same chronological position. But he and the planet were confused and identified,<sup>2</sup> and so the latter is styled in astronomical accounts Bhārgava, the 'sacrificing priest of the asuras' and 'divine'.<sup>3</sup> Further, since the first and second Bṛhaspatis were confused, the antagonism led to this rishi's being foisted as Bṛhaspati's adversary into the story of Tārā in late Puranas.<sup>4</sup>

The mythical rishi Atri was made one with the mythical Atri, who is called a primaeval prajāpati<sup>5</sup> and father of Soma,<sup>6</sup> the moon. Then he is confused with the Atri who was the father (or progenitor) of Datta and Durvāsas (who will be noticed in chapter XIX), and so Soma is made the brother of those two rishis.<sup>7</sup> Prabhākara, the earliest Ātreya mentioned, is connected in a fable with the sun,<sup>8</sup> and the fable has no doubt been evolved out of his name and Svastyātreya the name of his descendants, and is explained as referring to an eclipse of the sun.<sup>9</sup>

Kaśyapa son of Marīci is alleged to be the progenitor of the Kāśyapa brahmans, but there is no mention of any rishi called Kaśyapa until Rāma Jāmadagnya's time, as will be shown in chapter XX, and Marīci's son Kaśyapa is made a prajāpati,<sup>10</sup> or is identified with the Kaśyapa who in accounts of the creation is made the progenitor of all beings, and is called the father of the gods and asuras.<sup>1</sup> Thus the first account given that professes to be a varṇa of the Kāśyapas<sup>2</sup> diverges off into the creation. It declares that in this lineage the world had its origin, thus: Marici begot a son, the prajāpati Ariṣṭanemi, who afterwards became Kaśyapa<sup>3</sup> and married Dakṣa's daughters, whence came the origin of all beings. It is also said Nārada was Brahmā's son but, because of Dakṣa's curse, became the son of Kaśyapa or of Kaśyapa's son:<sup>4</sup> and further that Kaśyapa begot Nārada, Parvata and Arundhatī, whom Nārada gave as wife to 'Vasiṣṭha'.<sup>5</sup> It is all myth.

Besides the foregoing brahman families other brahman families and gotras arose, which claimed no primaeva antiquity. They were of three classes. First, the Viśvāmitras, who were descended from Viśvāmitra, king of Kānyakubja, who became a brahman and established an independent family. Secondly, sub-families founded by kṣatriya princes, some of which became brahmans forthwith, such as the Kāṇvas and Vitahavyas (chapters XIX and XVII), while others became first kṣatriyan brahmans, as will be explained in chapter XXIII, were incorporated into pure brahmanic families and then became entirely brahmans. These two classes took their rise at definite chronological stages. The third class comprised brahman families, such as the Agastyas (chapter XXII), which appeared, but the origin of which is uncertain.

In considering notices of rishis, it is very necessary to remember the cautions explained in chapter XII. It will be convenient here to give a table showing the chronological position of the ancient rishis, as they are ascertained in the preceding and following chapters, and it is arranged according to the scale in the table of royal genealogies in chapter XII, that is, the numbers correspond in both tables, and the two read together show what kings and rishis were contemporaries. This table will elucidate the discussions in the following chapters. The Matsya (195 to 202) gives copious lists of rishis and gotras in the brahman families, and it will be found that gotras of the same name sometimes existed in two families.<sup>1</sup> This renders it at times hardly certain to which family a rishi mentioned by his gotra name should be assigned, yet generally one gotra was far more distinguished than the other, so that it is reasonable to place such a rishi in the family in which the gotra was distinguished. Where a rishi is mentioned only by his gotra name without any personal name, the former is placed within inverted commas; and where a rishi can be assigned only tentatively to a particular position, his name is marked thus (?). Rishis and teachers after the Bhārata battle are dealt with in chapter XXVII.

<sup>1</sup> Thus, Paulastya besides being a family was also a Bhārgava gotra (Mat 195, 30). Kutsa was both Āṅgirasa and Bhārgava (id. 195, 22; 196, 37). There were Kāñras among the Vasiṣthas, as well as Kāñvāyanas (Kāñras) among the Āṅgirasas (id. 196, 21; 200, 9).

CHAPTER XVII

THE BHĀRGAVAS

THE Bhārgavas claimed descent from the primaeval rishi Bhṛgu, and they are also called Bhṛgus indiscriminately ; thus Cyavana is called Bhṛgu<sup>1</sup> and Bhṛgu's son ;<sup>2</sup> his descendant Rcīka is equally called Bhṛgu<sup>3</sup> and Bhṛgu's son ;<sup>4</sup> and Rcīka's grandson Rāma Jāmadagnya is also called Bhṛgu<sup>5</sup> and Bhṛgu's son.<sup>6</sup> This general use of the name Bhṛgu produces great confusion, if it is taken to denote one and the same rishi, but when applied to a rishi it means simply a Bhṛgu, a Bhārgava.

The varṇa of the Bhārgavas is set out in Vāyu 65, 72–96, Brahmandā iii, 1, 73–100 and Matsya 195, 11–46. The first two give the best genealogical account ; the third is fullest as regards names and gotras. Brief accounts are also found in the Mahābhārata.<sup>7</sup> The Vāyu and Brahmandā texts collated are treated here as the genealogy. It shows that real tradition has been mixed up with mythology, Usanas-Śukra is identified with the planet Venus, and among Bhṛgu's offspring are included gods and semi-divine personages. The Matsya account says Bhṛgu married Puloman's daughter Divyā, and had by her the twelve Bhṛgu gods,<sup>8</sup> Cyavana and Apnavāna ; Apnavāna's son was Aurva and his son was Jamadagni. The best Mahābhārata account<sup>9</sup> says Bhṛgu had two sons, Śukra-Kavi-Graha<sup>10</sup> who was guru of the Daityas and gods (sura), and Cyavana ; Cyavana married Manu's daughter Āruṣī and had a son Aurva ; Aurva's son was Rcīka, who had a hundred sons, the eldest of whom was Jamadagni ; and Jamadagni had four sons of whom Rāma was the youngest. The other Mahābhārata passages will be considered separately.

Cyavana, it is often said, married Sukanyā, daughter of Manu's son, king Śaryāti,<sup>8</sup> and sacrificed for him.<sup>9</sup> He is also connected with Manu's other son Pṛśadhra.<sup>10</sup> His position is therefore clearly fixed, though late, and especially brahmanic, tales wrongly introduce him as existing at other periods;<sup>11</sup> and he is made the subject of fable even in the Rigveda.<sup>12</sup>

hostile to the Aryans, being called their guru,<sup>1</sup> ācārya,<sup>2</sup> upādhyāya,<sup>3</sup> purohita,<sup>4</sup> and yajaka.<sup>5</sup> His intimate connexion with them is often alluded to.<sup>6</sup> In later notices his position was improved and he became guru or ācārya of the gods (deva) as well as of the Daityas,<sup>7</sup> and then more positively of the gods and asuras<sup>8</sup>—an impossible status. So he is called divine,<sup>9</sup> but never, as far as I know, unequivocally teacher or priest of the gods alone. The change was manifestly in this direction, for it is incredible that it could have been the reverse way, since the Daityas and Dānavas were metamorphosed into demons by later fancy; hence in the passages where he is called priest of the suras, ‘gods,’ also, the word sura has probably superseded asura sometimes. Why the change took place is not clear, but improvement may have been felt to be required after that metamorphosis and after the Bhārgavas became famous brahmans; and it is worthy of note that fables say Śiva took Kavi as his son (chapter XVI), and Umā prevented Śiva from slaying Uśanas, whence Uśanas became her son.<sup>10</sup>

His original position comes out clearly from stories of the war between the devas (gods) and asuras.<sup>11</sup> He was on the asuras’ side and restored the slain asuras to life by means of a potent spell called mrta-saṇjivani,<sup>12</sup> which he had obtained from Śiva<sup>13</sup> and which the devas did not know.<sup>14</sup> The devas’ priest Brhaspati could not restore the slain devas to life, until (according to one version<sup>1</sup>) his son Kaca succeeded by stratagem in learning the spell from Śukra. Then the devas got it and vanquished Śukra and the asuras.<sup>2</sup>

The genealogy says Śukra's wife was the pitr-karyā Go,<sup>3</sup> and they had four sons, Tvaṣṭṛ, Varūtrin, Śaṇḍa (or Śaṇḍa) and Marka.<sup>4</sup> Tvaṣṭṛ introduces, and passes off into, mythology, with his alleged two sons, Triśiras-Viśvarūpa and Viśvakarman. Varūtrin had three sons (named), who were priests of the Daityas,<sup>5</sup> hostile to Indra, and so perished. Śaṇḍa and Marka were priests of the asuras according to Vedic literature,<sup>6</sup> and are mentioned in the Puranas<sup>7</sup> in connexion with a great war between the devas and the Daityas and Dānavas. It is said that at the devas' entreaty they abandoned the Daityas and Dānavas and helped the devas, who then were victorious; and it appears to be said that Śukra then cursed them.<sup>8</sup> Śukra had a daughter Devayāṇī by (the genealogy says) Jayantī;<sup>9</sup> and she married king Yayāti (p. 86). Tradition then leaves Uśanas-Śukra's lineage in this position, that it sank as the Daityas fell and disappeared in one way or another, and certainly no brahmaṇī family (as far as I am aware) claimed descent from him, unless possibly the Mārkanḍeyas were descended from Marka (see infra).

It must be noticed that Cyavana's family and Uśanas-Śukra's family appear to have occupied different regions. Cyavana is always connected with the west of India, the country around the Gulf of Cambay,<sup>10</sup> in or near Śaryāti's territory Ānarta (Gujarat) as shown by the story of his marrying Sukanyā, and by the statement that he performed austerities near the Vaidūrya Mts (the west portion of the Satpura range) and the R. Narmadā.<sup>1</sup> Uśanas-Śukra is connected rather with the central region of N. India, for Yayāti king of Pratiṣṭhāna (Allahabad) met his daughter Devayānī near his own territory and married her;<sup>2</sup> and Kapālamocana on the Sarasvatī is called his tīrtha.<sup>3</sup> Cyavana's descendants remained connected with west India,<sup>4</sup> and when the Haihayas dominated that region and the Śāryāta kingdom perished (p. 98), they became associated with the Haihayas. It is they who produced the great Bhārgava family, that has now to be considered.

<sup>5</sup> The Vā reading brahmīṣṭhā sura-yājakāḥ is clearly wrong and should be brahmīṣṭhāsura-yājakāḥ for brahmīṣṭhāḥ asura-yājakāḥ by double sandhi as is not uncommon in the Puranas. Cf. Viṣ i, 17, 48, where Bhārgavas were purohitas to the Daitya king Hirānyakaśipu.

Two sons are given to Cyavana and Sukanyā, Apnavāna and Dadhīca. Apnavāna is mentioned in the Rigveda,<sup>5</sup> and his name is corrupted in the Puranas to Āpnūvāna,<sup>6</sup> Āpravāna,<sup>7</sup> Ātmavāna<sup>8</sup> and Ātmavant.<sup>9</sup> The Matsya account wrongly makes Cyavana and Apnavāna brothers, because Apnavāna's wife Ruci has the patronymic Nāhuṣī, which means no doubt that she was daughter of the Aila king Nāhuṣa, so that he would have been a younger contemporary of Nāhuṣa and therefore a descendant rather than brother of Cyavana. Dadhīca is hopelessly enveloped in fable.<sup>10</sup> A son Sārasvata is assigned to him, of whom a fable is narrated.<sup>11</sup> Another account gives another son, Pramati, to Cyavana,<sup>12</sup> but the connexion has been greatly contracted as will be explained.

The genealogy says Apnavāna's son was Urva, but it has contracted the pedigree, because, as the following account shows, Urva was later and therefore was a descendant.<sup>13</sup>

A notice of these Bhārgavas is given in two accounts. One says<sup>14</sup>—The Bhṛgus or Bhārgavas were priests to king Kṛtavīrya

(of the Haihayas) and he bestowed great wealth on them. After his death the princes of his family demanded it back, but the Bhārgavas refused to give it up. They used violence to the Bhārgavas, and the Bhārgavas fled to other countries for safety. One of the Bhārgava wives gave birth to a son then who was called Aurva (p. 68). The other account says,<sup>1</sup> in prophetic form—The ksatriyas fell out with the Bhārgavas and slew them, and Bhārgava Urva<sup>2</sup> was born then. His son was Rcīka. Both accounts<sup>3</sup> say that the son born then cherished great wrath against the adversaries but stayed it awhile. That was natural. The Bhārgavas were filled with anger against the Haihayas, yet could not contend successfully against them. They could look for revenge only through force of arms, and further notices show that they turned their thoughts to arms and sought alliance with ksatriyas in marriage. Rcīka was a famous rishi.<sup>4</sup>

Thus Rcīka Aurva became skilled in archery.<sup>5</sup> He sought in marriage Satyavatī daughter of Gādhi or Gāthīn, king of Kānyakubja. Gādhi did not relish his suit and tried to evade it by demanding a gift of a thousand peculiarly coloured horses, it is said, but Rcīka supplied them and gained her.<sup>6</sup> The genealogy says Rcīka had many sons, of whom Jamadagni was the eldest.<sup>7</sup> None of the others are named, but perhaps Ajīgarta was one, for his son Śunahṣepa was a Bhārgava and was adopted by Viśvāmitra.<sup>8</sup> Jamadagni was trained to archery and arms,<sup>9</sup> and allied himself with the royal house of Ayodhyā, for he married Renukā daughter

These Aurvas lived in Madhyadeśa where they had fled and married,<sup>13</sup> and the Haihaya king Arjuna Kārtavīrya is said in his conquests there to have molested Jamadagni. There was hostility, and Arjuna's sons killed Jamadagni. Rāma in revenge killed Arjuna and also, it is said, many Haihayas (p. 151). The Haihayas pursued their devastating raids through N. India, until Sagara annihilated their power (p. 156). The brahmans confused all these occurrences in the fable that Rāma destroyed all kṣatriyas off the earth twenty-one times.<sup>1</sup> Consequently he is often styled the exterminator of the kṣatriyas.<sup>2</sup> But tradition, while apparently accepting that fable, redressed the honour of the kṣatriyas by two anachronistic fables, that Rāma challenged Rāma of Ayodhyā to fight and was defeated, and that he had a long contest with Bhīṣma also and was worsted (p. 72).

It is fabled that Rāma, after exterminating the kṣatriyas, sacrificed at Rāma-tirtha with Kaśyapa as his upādhyāya and gave him the earth (or a golden altar) as his fee: whereupon Kaśyapa banished him to the southern ocean, and the ocean made the Śūrpāraka country (near Bombay) for Rāma, and Rāma dwelt there.<sup>3</sup> Other stories say Rāma retired then to Mt. Mahendra,<sup>4</sup> which is generally identified with the Mahendra range in Orissa: and he is fabled to have lived on there till long ages later.<sup>5</sup> He is also fictitiously introduced into tales about later princes (e.g. pp. 67, 72).

The next Bhārgava rishi mentioned is the Aurva who succoured Sagara of Ayodhyā<sup>6</sup> and whose name was Agni.<sup>7</sup> He is the last Aurva alluded to.

About the same time lived king Vitahavya (or Vṛtihotra, p. 155), whom a Bhṛgu rishi saved from Pratardana of Kāśi by impliedly asserting that he was a brahman, and who consequently became a brahman.<sup>1</sup> His descendants are set out for fifteen generations. His son was Gr̄tsamada, whose eleventh descendant was Pramati, whose son was Ruru, whose son was Šunaka, from whom came the Šaunakas.<sup>2</sup> It is not said which family he was adopted into, but it was the Bhārgavas, because the last portion of that genealogy, with all the preceding ancestry omitted, is given in an account which makes Pramati to be son of Cyavana,<sup>3</sup> and because Vitihavya, Gr̄tsamada and the Šaunakas are named in the Bhārgava vamśa.<sup>4</sup> It is however said elsewhere that a Šunaka and the Šaunakas were descended from a Gr̄tsamada, a son of Sunahotra, son of Kṣatrvyādha, who founded the Kāsi dynasty<sup>5</sup> (p. 86). Both these stories make a Gr̄tsamada ancestor of the Šaunakas. On the other hand, it is said there was a Gr̄tsamada, who was son of Šunahotra by birth, was (or became) an Āngirasa, and afterwards became a Bhārgava of the Šaunaka gotra.<sup>6</sup> It is said in the first story that Vitihavya's son Gr̄tsamada is mentioned in the Rigveda,<sup>7</sup> but this is inconsistent, because the above comment on the Rigveda means that the Šaunakas were a Bhārgava gotra before this Gr̄tsamada's time, and he became virtually a descendant of Šunaka by the adoption into the Šaunakas. It appears that there were two Gr̄tsamadas and two Šunakas, and therefore two Šaunaka gotras; and the others will be found among the kṣatriyan brahmans in chapter XXIII; hence there were numberless 'Šaunakas'.

The only Šaunaka of importance with a personal name was Indrota, who is called Daivāpa in Vedic literature, that is, son of Devāpi Šaunaka. The story about him has been narrated above (p. 114) and fixes his time as that of Janamejaya II Pārikṣita. A Šaunaka was the chief of the rishis at the great sacrifice in Naimiṣa forest, to whom it is said the Mahābhārata<sup>8</sup> was recited, and also the Matsya and other Puranas,<sup>9</sup> in the reign of Adhisīnamakṛṣṇa (p. 52).

The genealogy also says that many outsiders among other rishis were known as Bhārgavas,<sup>4</sup> and such were the following who are named by the Matsya, Maudgalāyana, Sāṅkṛtya, Gārgyāyāna and Gārgya, Kapi, Maitreya, Vadhryaśva and Divodāsa.<sup>5</sup> All these were 'kṣatriyan brahmans' (chapter XXIII). The Matsya account says in conclusion, 'These noble men who have been mentioned, born in the Bhṛgu vāṇīśa, were founders of royal gotras.'

The genealogy says there were seven pakṣas or groups among the Bhārgavas, named Vatsa, Bida, Ārṣṭiṣeṇa, Yaska, Vainya or Pathya, Śaunaka and Mitreyu,<sup>6</sup> and the Matsya list mentions them all<sup>7</sup> except Vainya or Pathya, but Pathya is obviously a mistake for Pṛthya, and Vainya and Pṛthya are the same, viz. those who claimed descent from Pṛthu son of Vena, for Vainya Pṛthu is included in a list of eighteen Bhārgava hymn-makers,<sup>8</sup> and appears as Venya Pṛthī in Rigveda x, 148, 5. That list names Bida,<sup>9</sup> Ārṣṭiṣeṇa and Śaunaka also and fourteen others.

Among the Bhārgavas were also the Mārkandeyas,<sup>10</sup> and Mārkandya is mentioned as a gotra-founder among the Bhārgavas,<sup>11</sup> but there is no mention of them in the genealogy. Mārkandeya is a patronymic from Mārkandya,<sup>12</sup> and these are sometimes treated as equivalent terms.<sup>13</sup> 'Mārkandeya' is a vague and elusive figure, often mentioned as a distinguished rishi and introduced at various times and with reference to various places.<sup>1</sup> There was of course a family of Mārkandeyas, yet 'Mārkandeya' is regarded sometimes as only one rishi who was long-lived.<sup>2</sup> He appears always without any personal name or definite connexion. Though a Bhārgava, 'Mārkandeya' always stands rather apart, and there is no real explanation, as far as I know, how the Mārkandeyas arose. Mārkandeya is said to have been a son of a rishi Mṛkānda or Mṛkandu,<sup>3</sup> but they are placed in the Svāyambhuva manvantara,<sup>4</sup> which is irrelevant here. It seems probable that Mārkānda is to be connected with Marka,<sup>5</sup> son of Uśanas-Śukra. All Śukra's descendants by holding to non-Aryan tribes disappeared, except Śāṅda and Marka as mentioned above; and if so, the descendants of Marka would have obtained a permanent position among the Aryans, and may have been the Mārkandeyas.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE VASIṢṬHAS

THE Vasiṣṭha family was connected with the kings of Ayodhyā from the earliest times and the Vasiṣṭhas were their hereditary priests.<sup>6</sup> Thus a Vasiṣṭha is mentioned in connexion with Ikṣvāku and his son Vikukṣi-Śāśāda,<sup>7</sup> and with Ikṣvāku's son Nimi the first king of Videha; but these particular allusions may be mythical and the fable about Nimi and Vasiṣṭha will be noticed infra. Many Vasiṣṭhas can be distinguished in tradition, but they have been sadly confused in brahmanic stories through the habit of referring to them only by their gotra name Vasiṣṭha. It is rare to find any Vasiṣṭha mentioned by his personal name until we reach Śakti, and the confusion may be illustrated in two ways. First, the epithet of the primaeva mythical Vasiṣṭha, 'Brahmā's son', is applied to the fifth<sup>1</sup> of the Vasiṣṭhas distinguished here, and also to the fourth and seventh confused;<sup>2</sup> and similarly Arundhatī<sup>3</sup> is the name of the wife of the mythical Vasiṣṭha and also of the fourth Vasiṣṭha,<sup>4</sup> of the fifth,<sup>5</sup> and of the seventh.<sup>6</sup> Secondly the confusion went so far that it was declared that one Vasiṣṭha had been priest to many generations of Aikṣvākus,<sup>7</sup> and finally that there was only one great Vasiṣṭha who had lived through all the ages.<sup>8</sup>

Consequently the framing of the Vasiṣṭha genealogy became perplexing and difficult; still a vaini was constructed. The Vāyu, Brahmāṇḍa and Liṅga<sup>9</sup> give a common version with minor variations. The Kūrma gives a short and different version, which hardly merits notice. The Matsya has a full list of the rishis and gotras without any pedigree except the piece from 'Vasiṣṭha' to Dvaiḍāyanā (Vyāsa).<sup>10</sup> Collating the first three texts, the version appended seems most probable,<sup>11</sup> omitting the first nine lines which refer to the mythical Vasiṣṭha. The genealogy consists of three distinct sections, lines 1–11, 12–16 and 17–18, which seemingly start from one and the same Vasiṣṭha but really give separate disconnected pedigrees as will appear. It is not accurate, but may supplement information derived from elsewhere; and the only safe course is to distinguish the several Vasiṣṭhas in connexion with the kings with whom they were associated, and if possible to fix the distinction by names or by appellations that are applied to them and that may be personal names or may reasonably be utilized as such.

The earliest Vasiṣṭha who has a definite position was the famous priest of Ayodhyā in the reigns of Trayyāruṇa, Satyavrata-Triśaṅku and Hariscandra, whose story has been alluded to (p. 151), and may be narrated here.<sup>1</sup>

Satyavrata was banished by his father Trayyāruṇa and was kept in exile by Vasiṣṭha, who held the kingdom on Trayyāruṇa's departure. Then occurred a famine for twelve years. At that time Viśvaratha was king of Kānyakubja, but relinquished his kingdom, gave himself up to austerities,<sup>2</sup> became a brahman and took the name Viśvāmitra. He championed Satyavrata's cause, and overcoming Vasiṣṭha's opposition restored him to the throne. Satyavrata appointed Viśvāmitra the royal priest. Vasiṣṭha, thus deprived of the kingdom and the priesthood, bore deadly enmity against Viśvāmitra, and sought revenge by denying his brahmanhood. Vasiṣṭha's personal name was Devarāj.

The story goes on thus.<sup>1</sup> On Satyavrata's death his son Hariścandra was placed on the throne by Viśvāmitra, and Viśvāmitra offered the rājasūya sacrifice for him. But Vasiṣṭha's hatred and opposition led to Viśvāmitra's being obliged to depart, and he went to Puṣkara and gave himself up to austerities there.<sup>2</sup> Vasiṣṭha thus regained the priesthood. Hariścandra then begot a son Rohita, whom he had vowed to sacrifice to Varuṇa, but put off fulfilment for some twenty-two years, and then Rohita saved himself by buying the rishi Ajīgarta's son Śunahṣepa as a victim in his own stead. Śunahṣepa was a Bhārgava and appears to have been Viśvāmitra's grand-nephew, and, when the sacrifice was due, Viśvāmitra took part in it (his brahmanhood being now acknowledged), it was turned into a formal rite, and Śunahṣepa was set free. Śunahṣepa, having lost his position in his own family by the sale, was adopted by Viśvāmitra as his son with the name Devarāṭa.<sup>3</sup>

About the same time, according to tradition and the same synchronisms, lived Āpava Vasiṣṭha, whose hermitage near the Himalayas Arjuna Kārtavīrya burnt and who cursed him.<sup>4</sup> Āpava appears to be a patronymic, for he is called 'son of Varuṇa', Vāruṇi,<sup>5</sup> and āpu is supposed to be equivalent to Varuṇa.

The next great Vasiṣṭha was priest of Ayodhyā in the time of Hariścandra's eighth successor, Bāhu, whose position has been established above (p. 155). Bāhu was driven from his throne by the Haihaya-Tālajaṅghas aided by Śakas, Kāmbojas, Yavanas, Pāradas and Pahlavas from the north-west, but Vasiṣṭha maintained his position. Afterwards Bāhu's son Sagara conquered all those foes, regained the kingdom and determined to exterminate those tribes, which had meanwhile settled down in his territories, but Vasiṣṭha interposed and made him spare them.<sup>1</sup> This Vasiṣṭha is called Āpava<sup>2</sup> and Atharvanidhi,<sup>3</sup> and these may be taken as a name to distinguish him, Atharvanidhi I Āpava, from Atharvanidhi II who will be mentioned soon. He is confused with Devarāj Vasiṣṭha in brahmanical tales, and thus his connexion with the Śakas and other tribes led to the absurd detail in the fables about the contest between Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra, that Vasiṣṭha's cow created all those and other tribes to fight against Viśvāmitra.<sup>4</sup>

The fourth noted Vasiṣṭha was priest to Mitrasaha Kalmāṣapāda Saudāsa, king of Ayodhyā; the fifth was priest to Dilīpa II Khatvāṅga; the sixth was priest to Daśaratha and his son Rāma; and the seventh was priest to Paijavana Sudāsa (Sudāsa), king of N. Pañcāla (p. 116). The fifth is sometimes introduced as having instructed Dilīpa,<sup>5</sup> and they are the dramatis personae in the first three cantos of the Raghuvamśa,<sup>6</sup> where (i, 59) the epithet Atharvanidhi is given him. This may be taken as a name for him, and he may therefore be known as Atharvanidhi II, to distinguish him from the third Vasiṣṭha. The sixth holds a prominent position in the Rāmāyaṇa, but no special personal epithet seems to be applied to him.

The common name Vasiṣṭha, and the similarity in the names of their royal patrons, led to the fourth and the seventh Vasiṣṭhas being somewhat confused. A Vasiṣṭha had a son Śakti,<sup>7</sup> who had a son Parāśara, as the genealogy says; he was one of these two Vasiṣṭhas, and, as some of the stories confuse them, it is necessary to discuss and distinguish them.

He then became a Rākṣasa and cannibal,<sup>1</sup> and killed and devoured a brahman, but after twelve years regained his sanity. At his desire Vasiṣṭha begot a son Aśmaka of the queen Madayantī.<sup>2</sup>

As regards Sudās and his priest Vasiṣṭha the simplest story is in two parts. One<sup>3</sup> is that, at a great sacrifice by Sudās, Viśvāmitra was overcome by Śakti, but the Jāmadagnyas gave him speech and succoured the Kuśikas. The other<sup>4</sup> is that Śakti went to the forest, the king's servants who were under Viśvāmitra's bidding cast him into a forest fire, and Vasiṣṭha on learning of Śakti's fate restrained his grief.<sup>5</sup>

Next come the stories that introduce confusion. The Bṛhaddevatā says Vasiṣṭha Vārunī's hundred sons were slain by the Saudāsas, or by Sudāsa who in consequence of a curse had been transformed into a Rakṣas.<sup>6</sup> The Linga says that a Rākṣasa instigated by Viśvāmitra possessed king Kalmāṣapāda Saudāsa and in consequence of Śakti's curse devoured Śakti and all Vasiṣṭha's hundred sons; and Śakti's widow Adṛśyanti bore Parāśara afterwards.<sup>7</sup> The Mahābhārata amplifies the tale greatly.<sup>8</sup> Kalmāṣapāda had a dispute with Śakti and struck him and was cursed by him. Viśvāmitra, who coveted Vasiṣṭha's position, caused a Rākṣasa to possess the king, and the king then offered human flesh as food to an indigent brahman and was cursed by him. The king became a Rākṣasa,<sup>9</sup> a cannibal<sup>10</sup> maniac, and killed Śakti and all Vasiṣṭha's hundred sons.<sup>11</sup> Vasiṣṭha without seeking revenge tried to destroy himself, but in vain, and Śakti's widow Adṛśyanti then bore Parāśara. After twelve years Vasiṣṭha cured the king and they were reconciled. Vasiṣṭha then begot Aśmaka of the queen

Madayanti.<sup>1</sup> Manu says 'Vasiṣṭha swore an oath to Paijavana', and the commentators explain (turning the story round) that before king Sudās Viśvāmitra accused Vasiṣṭha of being a Rakṣas or Yātudhāna and eating his (the king's) hundred sons, and Vasiṣṭha took an oath denying the charge.<sup>2</sup>

This last story may be mistaken, but it is unnecessary to examine the differences in all these stories, because the material question here concerns Vasiṣṭha's son Śakti, whether he was killed by Kalmāṣapāda Saudāsa, or by Sudās (or his people, the Saudāsas), for both cannot be true and the two kings were apart in time (pp. 147-8).

There is one certain fact, Parāśara, Śatayātu and 'Vasiṣṭha' were contemporaries of Sudās Paijavana.<sup>3</sup> That Parāśara was Śakti's son is well attested;<sup>4</sup> and also that Śakti was killed;<sup>5</sup> and it is said his widow Adrśyanti bore Parāśara after his death,<sup>6</sup> a statement that appears true, and otherwise there is no reason why it should have been made in the above stories, and it finds some support from the above Rigvedic passage which omits Śakti. Śatayātu then could not be Śakti and was probably another son of Vasiṣṭha.<sup>7</sup> Thus Śakti lived in the time of Sudās of N. Pañcāla and not in that of Kalmāṣapāda Saudāsa of Ayodhyā; hence he has been wrongly introduced into the story of the latter king. It seems then most probable, that Kalmāṣapāda in his madness killed the sons of his priest 'Vasiṣṭha', and that Śakti alone, the son of Sudās's priest 'Vasiṣṭha', was killed in Sudās's reign. The Brhaddevatā has kept the two occurrences distinct in the passages cited above, but otherwise they have been confused, and the Mahābhārata and Liṅga, which know nothing of Sudās, have combined both occurrences into one story and transferred the whole of it to Kalmāṣapāda Saudāsa.<sup>1</sup>

We may endeavour to distinguish these two Vasiṣṭhas further as regards their personal names. Kalmāṣapāda's Vasiṣṭha is called brahma-koṣa,<sup>2</sup> and twice śreṣṭha-bhāj.<sup>3</sup> Either word might be an epithet or name. The former word appears to be an epithet, 'treasury of sacred lore,' because it is joined with other epithets,<sup>4</sup> and is applied to other rishis also.<sup>5</sup> Śreṣṭhabhāj is rare, and as an adjective, 'sharing in or possessing the best,'<sup>6</sup> has no obvious fitness in its context, where it would be quite appropriate as a name; and it is not given to any other rishi as far as I am aware. It may, then, be reasonably taken as a name, and Kalmāṣapāda's Vasiṣṭha may be distinguished as Śreṣṭhabhāj.

Sudās's Vasiṣṭha is not alluded to in Puranic tradition, but is mentioned in three stories in the epic, if he was the Vasiṣṭha who is connected with Saṁvarāṇa in them, namely, how Saṁvarāṇa was driven out of his kingdom of Hastināpura by a Pañcāla king (who was Sudās) and after obtaining 'Vasiṣṭha's' aid recovered his kingdom;<sup>7</sup> how afterwards 'Vasiṣṭha' obtained Tapatī as wife for Saṁvarāṇa; and how afterwards again 'Vasiṣṭha' governed the kingdom during twelve years of drought when Saṁvarāṇa was absent.<sup>8</sup> No special epithet is applied to Vasiṣṭha in the latter two stories,<sup>9</sup> but in the first he is called Suvarcas.<sup>10</sup> This was a name, not uncommon,<sup>11</sup> hence it may reasonably be taken here also as a name, and Saṁvarāṇa's Vasiṣṭha at that time may be distinguished as Vasiśtha Suvarcas. But Sudās's Vasiśtha was an old man in Sudās's reign, because his grandson Parāśara was old enough to take part in the hymn (vii, 18). He might be the Vasiśtha in the first story, but can hardly have been the Vasiśtha of the second and third stories.

It seems more probable, however, that the same Vasiśtha is meant in the three stories, and in that case Saṁvarana's Vasiśtha would not be the same as Sudās's Vasiśtha, but rather a son. If so, there is no name to be assigned to Sudās's Vasiśtha, and Saṁvarana's Vasiśtha would have the name Suvarcas,<sup>1</sup> and would be the ninth 'Vasiśtha' of note, reckoning Śakti as the eighth. Till this time the Vasiśthas had been almost exclusively connected with Ayodhyā or Videha,<sup>2</sup> and Sudās's Vasiśtha is the first who was definitely priest to an Aila king.<sup>3</sup> It may be suggested that the conquest of Śūrasena and Mathurā by Rāma's brother Śatruघna (p. 170), a little earlier than Sudās's reign, may have led some of the Vasiśthas into other kingdoms. Afterwards the Vasiśthas spread elsewhere, and various places were connected with 'Vasiśtha'.<sup>4</sup>

In these three rishis, 'Vasiśtha,' his son Śakti and his son Parāśara, occurs the first genuine pedigree<sup>5</sup> in the genealogy (lines 1, 2), the first part of the first section. It goes on to say that Parāśara was father of Kṛṣṇa Dvaiपāyana, that is, Vyāsa, by Kāli. Now Vyāsa was certainly son of a Parāśara and Kāli, as will be noticed, but he was born in king Śantanu's reign and she became Śantanu's queen. There was a long interval with many kings between Sudās (Sudāsa) of N. Pañcāla and Śantanu (p. 148), and it is impossible that Śakti's son Parāśara of Sudās's time<sup>6</sup> could have been Vyāsa's father. Vyāsa then was son of a Parāśara but not of Parāśara Sāktya. Hence there must have been two Parāśaras. This is not improbable (p. 130), and certain particulars support this conclusion.

<sup>3</sup> Rantideva Sāktya, who was earlier (p. 39), is said to have done honour to a 'Vasistha', MBh xiii, 137, 6250: xii, 234, 8591. In brahmanical fables 'Vasistha' is connected with king Nahuṣa the Aila erroneously, Pad ii, 108; also as priest with Purūravas, Br 151, 8, 10.

<sup>6</sup> This Parāśara is said to have destroyed Rākṣasas, MBh i, 181, 6866-85; Lg i, 64, 107; Viś i, 1, 4-34.

First, Parāśara (line 2) is called Sāgara or Svāgaja, and these two words are an instance of the importance of readings that appear unmeaning (p. 83). The Liṅga's reading jyāyaso throws no light on them, for it is obviously an 'emendation' to suit the alteration it has made in the preceding line, declaring that Śakti was the eldest of the hundred sons according to its confusion of the stories noticed above. Svāgaja suggests svāgraja, but the possible readings svāgrajām, svāgrajo and svāgrajāt are untenable, if we consider the force of sva, the fact that Śakti had only one son Parāśara who was born after his death, and the consequent meaning of the sentence. Sāgaram or Svāgajam must therefore be an accusative agreeing with Parāśaram. Śakti's son was Parāśara Śāktya, hence the passage suggests that there was a Parāśara called Sāgara or Svāgaja, and that it has blended the two.

Secondly, the Anukramanī, in its mention of Parāśara as part author of hymn ix, 97, seems conscious of a difference. It says that 'Vasiṣṭha' saw the first three verses, that the nine 'Vasiṣthas', Indrapramati, Viṣaganya, Manyu, Upamanyu, Vyāghrapad, Śakti, Karpaśrut, Mṛlika and Vasukra, each saw three more verses separately, and that Parāśara composed 14 and 'Kutsa' the rest. It thus knew that Śakti was a Vasiṣṭha, and also that he had a son Parāśara, for it attributes hymns i, 65 to 73 to Parāśara Śāktya, and so knew that Parāśara was a Vasiṣṭha. If then this Parāśara of ix, 97 was Śakti's son, it might naturally have called him Vasiṣṭha or Śāktya, yet it does not do so and leaves his name without particularization. This suggests that there might be a Parāśara other than Śāktya.<sup>1</sup> The Vedārthadīpikā on the same hymn tends to confirm this doubt, for it specifies 'Vasiṣṭha' as Maitrāvaruṇi, calls the nine others 'sons of Vasiṣṭha', yet makes no reference to Parāśara, who as author of 14 verses was more important than any of them, thus suggesting that it was not clear who this Parāśara was. Those nine Vasiṣthas were not all sons of one Vasiṣṭha, for Upamanyu was Indrapramati's grandson, as will appear, and the Vedārthadīpikā says they composed their verses all quite independently. The hymn therefore was not composed at one time, but grew in the course of time, so that Parāśara's later 14 verses may well have been added by a second Parāśara.

<sup>1</sup> Rīg v, 29 is attributed to Gauriviti Śāktya, but x, 73 and 74 simply to Gaurivīti by the Anukramanī, and it will appear among the Sāṅkṛtyas in chap. XXIII that there were probably two Gaurivītis: but the Vedārth ascribes the two latter hymns also to Śāktya.

There are reasonable grounds then, chronological and textual, for holding that there were two Parāśaras, and there is no improbability in this, for there were other Parāśaras later still; see chapter XXVII. The same names reappeared, as is proved by the fact that one of Kṛṣṇa Vyāsa's grandsons also was called Kṛṣṇa as the genealogy (lines 2-6) and other authorities that will be noticed say. To this later Parāśara,<sup>1</sup> who lived in Śantanu's time, we may fairly attach the epithet Sāgara or Svāgaja. Svāgaja is not grammatically a properly formed patronymic, but Sāgara is; hence we may prefer the latter and distinguish him as Sāgara, 'son of Sagara'.<sup>2</sup> The genealogy would then have blended the two Parāśaras,<sup>3</sup> just as it will now be shown to have confused two Śukas, yet its preservation of these two epithets has saved some trace of the distinction.

The Matsya says that Parāśara's descendants composed six pravaras, sub-families, named Gaura, Nīla, Kṛṣṇa, Śveta, Śyāma and Dhūmra;<sup>2</sup> but the genealogy says they formed eight pakṣas, 'groups,' namely, six bearing those six names and two others, which the readings leave doubtful but of which one seems probably Bādarika.

The second section of the genealogy (lines 12–16) says that 'Vasiṣṭha' had by his wife Kapiñjalī Ghṛtāci a famous son Indrapramati,<sup>3</sup> well known as Kuṇī or Kuṇīti.<sup>4</sup> He married Pr̥thu's daughter and had a son Vasu,<sup>5</sup> and Vasu had a son Upamanyu,<sup>6</sup> the progenitor of the Upamanyus or Aupamanyavas. Indrapramati was a well-known rishi,<sup>7</sup> and there were more than one rishi named Upamanyu, as will appear. These two and Śakti and six other Vasiṣṭhas, as mentioned above, each composed three verses of Rigveda ix, 97, all independently, so that Upamanyu's contribution must have been some time after Indrapramati's, if the order of the rishis is chronological; and Indrapramati later than Maitrāvaraṇi Vasiṣṭha, if the opening verses were composed by the latter.<sup>8</sup>

The third section of the genealogy (lines 17–18) says that from Mitra and Varuna sprang the Vasiṣṭhas who were called Kundīns, Kundīneyas or Kaundīnyas.<sup>9</sup> This deals with the Vasiṣṭha who was called Maitrāvaraṇa<sup>10</sup> or Maitrāvaraṇi.<sup>11</sup> This name is acknowledged to be a patronymic and is taken to mean 'son of Mitra and Varuṇa', and is explained by a fable, that from them both, after they saw the apsaras Urvaśī, Vasiṣṭha was born in a jar and so was son of both, and Agastya also was so begotten and born at the same time.<sup>1</sup> The fable appears in Rigveda vii, 33, but the statements there are hardly consistent or have blended different fancies, for verse 13 says both were so born in a jar together,<sup>2</sup> while verse 12 says that Vasiṣṭha was born of Urvaśī the apsaras.

The fable was obviously devised to explain the name Maitrāvaruna, and the hymn has combined that with another fable that 'Vasiṣṭha' (and not Agastya<sup>3</sup>) was born of Urvaśī in order to explain the metronymic Aurvaśa which was the name of a 'Vasiṣṭha'.<sup>4</sup> This view is supported by another fact, that a reason why 'Vasiṣṭha' was born from Mitra and Varuṇa was necessary and was supplied by another fable, often linked with the former. Nimi, the first king of Videha, and 'Vasiṣṭha' had a quarrel and cursed each other to become bodiless (vi-deha);<sup>5</sup> both then went to Brahmā and he assigned Nimi to the eyes of creatures, whence they wink (nimeṣa), and said Vasiṣṭha should be son of Mitra and Varuṇa with the name Vasiṣṭha.<sup>6</sup> This fable has manifestly been fabricated or modified to explain the name Videha and supply a reason for the birth from Mitra and Varuṇa.

The fable is impossible. Maitrāvaruna is a proper patronymic from Mitrāvaruṇa. The earliest rishis sometimes bore the names of gods (p. 131), and if they chose the double name of these two gods who are so often united, it would appear as Mitrāvaraṇa,<sup>1</sup> which does actually occur as the name of a Vasiśtha.<sup>2</sup>

The genealogy makes this Vasiśtha Mitrāvaraṇa ancestor only of the Kundins, or Kundinas as the name is more often given. This family obviously took its name from its ancestor, just like the Viśvāmitras, Kanvas and others. Hence he was Kundin, or Kundina, Mitrāvaraṇa, son of Mitrāvaraṇa. Kundina is named as a Vasiśtha twice and mentioned along with Mitrāvaraṇa,<sup>3</sup> and both (p. 214) were Vasiśthas who were brahma-vādins. Kundina would naturally be connected with kundin, 'having a pitcher,' and Mitrāvaraṇa was taken to mean 'son of Mitra and Varuna'; thus these two names reveal at once how the above fables were fabricated by way of folk etymology.

The fable about Vasiśtha and Agastya is very ancient, because it was current when hymn vii, 33 was composed in or soon after the reign of Sudās, whom it praises and whose chronological position has been fixed (p. 172); and it required time for its development. So far as it concerns Agastya it will be further noticed in chapter XXII. The Vasiśthas were a well known family then, as verses 2-9 show; hence it obviously refers to some progenitor, and therefore Mitrāvaraṇa was a Vasiśtha far earlier than Sudās's priest Vasiśtha. Vasiśtha Mitrāvaraṇi is said to have composed the first three verses of hymn ix, 97 and hymns vii, 1 and 3 to 17,<sup>4</sup> and even all the hymns in the seventh maṇḍala,<sup>5</sup> but vii, 33 can be his

only if Maitrāvaraṇi means a descendant of Maitrāvaraṇa, for Maitrāvaraṇa, as shown, lived far earlier. The epic applies Maitrāvaraṇi to the fourth Vasiṣṭha, who was Kalmāṣapāda's priest,<sup>1</sup> and this is quite possibly right; but the Bṛhaddevatā calls him Vāruni (vi, 33-4), perhaps for short. All that seems clear is that Maitrāvaraṇa was Kundīna and was long prior to Sudās's Vasiṣṭha, and that Mitrāvaraṇa Vasiṣṭha was earlier still.<sup>2</sup>

The patronymic Vāruni is also applied to a Vasiṣṭha who sang the fable about king Nāhuṣa (Yayāti?) and the Sarasvatī,<sup>3</sup> and to Āpava Vasiṣṭha (ante). A Vasiṣṭha unspecified is said to have had a father Varuṇa.<sup>4</sup>

Other Vasiṣṭhas are alluded to: thus, one was purohita of Mucukunda,<sup>5</sup> as would be natural, since this Mucukunda was no doubt the son of Māndhāṭṛ of Ayodhyā (p. 98); and another, as mentioned above, received honour from king Rantideva, who was about contemporary with king Hastin (pp. 112, 146).

The Jātūkarnyas were a Vasiṣṭha gotra.<sup>6</sup> This name is a patronymic, and so there were several of the name. Jātūkarna or a Jātūkarnya is said to have taught Vyāsa the Veda<sup>7</sup> and the Purana,<sup>8</sup> and is described as Vyāsa's predecessor as regards the Veda.<sup>9</sup> There were other Jātūkarnyas later.<sup>10</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Some passages even make Maitrāvaraṇi Vasiṣṭha the purohita of Manu's sons, Mat 12, 4-5: Pad v, 8, 109-10. This may have some connexion with the above fable and with the fable that Manu's daughter Ila was produced by Mitra and Varuṇa at Manu's sacrifice; Vā 85, 6, 9, 13; Bd iii, 60, 5, 8, 12; Hv 10, 615-22; Br 7, 3-8; Viṣ iv, 1, 6-8.

<sup>7</sup> Vā 1, 44. Hv 42, 2364. Vedic literature says Vyāsa was a disciple of Viṣvaksena, Vedic Index, ii, 339. The two may be the same.

CHAPTER XIX

THE ĀNGIRASAS AND KĀNVAS

THE mythical founder Āngiras has been noticed in chapter XVI, and also the divine priest Br̥haspati. A vāṁśa of the Āngirasas is given by the Brahmanāda and Vāyu, and the Matsya gives a long list of the rishis and gotras.<sup>1</sup> Genealogical statements are found elsewhere but are few and brief. ‘Āngiras,’ like the names of the other primaeval rishis, is applied indiscriminately to Āngirasa rishis; thus Utathya is so called,<sup>2</sup> and also Drona or his father Bharadvāja.<sup>3</sup> The names Br̥haspati<sup>4</sup> and Bharadvāja<sup>5</sup> were also freely used instead of patronymics, as will appear, and are often quite vague.

The accounts in the Brahmanāda and Vāyu collated suggest the probable text; but they are not a genuine genealogy, for they mix up mythological persons as the Āngirasa deities and R̥bhus with historical persons and have confused the relationships of the rishis. We must therefore consider the various Āngirasa rishis according to the information available elsewhere. A remarkable point is that the genealogy gives the first Āngiras the name Atharvan and makes Atharvan Āngiras the progenitor of all the Āngirasas,<sup>6</sup> so that ‘Atharvan’ and ‘Āngiras’ become equivalent, and they may all be designated Atharvāngiras.

The earliest rishi who is called an Āngiras is the priest Br̥haspati who supported the gods (devas)<sup>7</sup> in their war against the Daityas, Dānavas and asuras, who were aided by the priest Uśanas-Śukra

<sup>6</sup> Atharvāngiras = Āngiras, MBh v, 17, 548–51, which says Āngiras has the name Atharvāngiras in the Atharvaveda and connects him with that. Mundaka Upanisad i, 1, 1–2 mythologizes; SBE xv, 27.

<sup>7</sup> Referred to in MBh i, 76, 3188: xii, 37, 1353; 152, 5667; 338, 12752: probably in vi, 50, 2073. For the divine priest, see chap. XVI; and the devāsura wars, p. 187, note <sup>2</sup>.

(chapter XVII). That story gives him a chronological position, but it seems doubtful if he really was an Āngiras, for he is not, I believe, ever derived from Atharvan Āngiras. Fable in one form says he had a son Kaca (p. 196). References to 'Br̄haspati' occur in connexion with other persons, which show the lack of the historical sense and are vague, and being worthless for the present purpose are not cited here.<sup>1</sup>

The earliest time at which Āngirasas are alleged to have existed was in the reign of Māndhāṭṛ king of Ayodhyā, for he himself, his sons, grandsons and his descendants the Viṣṇuvṛddhas and Hāritas are said to have joined the Āngirasas (chapter XXIII), but no Āngirasas are named about that time.

The earliest time at which a real Āngirasa rishi is alleged to have existed was in the reign of Hariscandra of Ayodhyā, when Ajigarta sold his son Śunahṣepa as a sacrificial victim instead of Rohita, and Ayāsyā officiated as a priest at the ceremony (chapter XVIII). In the brahmanical books Ajigarta is called an Āngirasa, but they have made mistakes (pp. 10, 100) and introduce extravagant mythology into the story; and they are no doubt wrong in making Ajigarta an Āngirasa, because better authority says his son Śunahṣepa was a Bhārgava (chapter XVII). Ayāsyā was an Āngirasa rishi,<sup>2</sup> but no reliance can be placed on those books when they say he was present, in view of those mistakes and because the Brahma substitutes (though probably wrongly) Vāmadeva for him. There is nothing to show to what time Ayāsyā should be assigned. He was the reputed author of hymns.<sup>3</sup>

The traditions which give the earliest genuine historical setting to the Āngirasas connect them with the kings who reigned in the portion of North Bihar of which Vaiśāli became the capital afterwards (p. 97). They come into notice there first with king Karandhama, his son Avr̄ksit and his son the famous Marutta Āvīkṣita, being their hereditary priests. Their chronological position and connexions have been explained above (pp. 157 f.), namely, of Uśīja, his three sons<sup>1</sup> Ucathya<sup>2</sup> (or Utathya), Br̥haspati<sup>3</sup> and Saṁvarta,<sup>4</sup> Ucathya's son Dirghatamas by his wife Mamatā, and Br̥haspati's son Bharadvāja<sup>5</sup> and descendant (probably great grandson) Vidathin Bharadvāja. These rishis thus began in the country of Vaiśālt, and moved westwards in time. Bharadvāja moved to Kāśi, and became purohita to king Divodāsa II of Kāśi.<sup>6</sup> Vidathin Bharadvāja was adopted by king Bharata as his son (p. 159), and the Bhāradvājas remained connected with the Paurava dynasty.

Dirghatamas was set adrift in the Ganges and carried down to the country called Aṅga afterwards. He lived there and married a śūdra woman,<sup>7</sup> to whom the name Uśīj appears to be wrongly attributed (p. 161). She is called Auśinārī.<sup>8</sup> By her he had Kakṣīvant and other sons. He gained his sight and assumed the name Gautama or Gotama.<sup>9</sup> He and his śūdra-born sons went to Girivraja in the country known afterwards as Magadha,<sup>10</sup> and after long austerities they attained brahmanhood there. Kakṣīvant begot many sons who were called the Kuśmāṇḍa<sup>11</sup> Gautamas, and he must be distinguished from a later Kakṣīvant (infra). Towards the end of his life Dirghatamas consecrated king Bharata. These particulars have been discussed above (pp. 158, 162).

<sup>9</sup> So, apparently, Br̥hadd i, 125; MBh xii, 343, 13184. But sometimes Gautama is treated as an earlier patronymic, being given to him and his younger brother, Mat 48, 53, 84. This name (go-tama) has no doubt some connexion with the allegation of his immoral imitation of cattle, Vā 99, 47-61, 88-92; Bd iii, 74, 47-61, 90-4; Mat 48, 43-56, 79-84.

A paternal cousin of Dr̥ghatamas is called Śaradvant,<sup>1</sup> but nothing more is said of him. The Śaradvant mentioned in the genealogy may be he or a later Śaradvant, infra.

Bharadvāja Bārhaspatya Vidathin, who was adopted by Bharata (p. 163); is said to have had five sons, Suhotra, Śunahotra, Nara, Garga and R̥jīśvan, who were Bhāradvājas and could claim optionally to be grandsons of Br̥haspati or of Bharata.<sup>2</sup> The option involved that they could be either brahmans or kṣatriyas, and the mention of it implies that they exercised it, as will appear in chapter XXIII. The Vedārthadīpikā also says they belonged to the Bārhaspatya gotra of Śāmyu (who is elsewhere declared to have been son of a Br̥haspati,<sup>3</sup> and was therefore prior to these five persons), and they expanded<sup>4</sup> the family of the Bhāradvājas; but its genealogy is contracted and incorrect, for they were not brothers, and they were not sons but descendants of Vidathin Bharadvāja.<sup>5</sup> R̥jīśvan was a son or descendant of Vidathin, for he is called Vaidathina,<sup>6</sup> and he is also called son of 'Bharadvāja' and son's son of 'Br̥haspati' or of Bharata,<sup>7</sup> where the word 'son' obviously does not mean immediate sonship. Accordingly, since he and the other four mentioned were born in the Paurava line and yet he was of Śāmyu's gotra, Śāmyu son of 'Br̥haspati'<sup>8</sup> must be placed before Vidathin and after the Br̥haspati mentioned above; and R̥jīśvan with or soon after Garga and Nara's son Sank̥ti (pp. 112, 191).

A later Bharadvāja was connected with the Paurava king Ajamīḍha.<sup>9</sup> Next may be mentioned Pāyu, who was a Bhāradvāja.

<sup>2</sup> Anukramanī and Vedārth on Rigv vi, 52. The latter's account hardly agrees with the itihāsa it quotes, for it explains the option by asserting the five sons had two mothers, while the itihāsa says they were all sons of one wife (verse 14) and explains that option by the adoption (verses 12–15).

He was a contemporary of Prastoka Sārñjaya, Abhyāvartin Cāyamāna, and Divodāsa king of N. Pañcāla.<sup>1</sup>

Vāmadeva was a well-known Āngirasa rishi, as the genealogy says.<sup>2</sup> Hymns ascribed to him show he was a Gautama<sup>3</sup> and refer to Dīrghatamas.<sup>4</sup> In one hymn 'Vāmadeva' shows he was later than Rjīśvan Vaidathina,<sup>5</sup> and others ascribed to him indicate he was later than Divodāsa Atithigva and Trasadasyu<sup>6</sup> who were contemporaries (p. 170), and was a contemporary of Somaka Sāhadevya.<sup>7</sup> Elsewhere 'Vāmadeva' is connected with kings Śala and Dala,<sup>8</sup> who appear to be the kings of Ayodhyā, No. 77 (p. 149), later still. These indications suggest that the first Vāmadeva lived in the time of Somaka. Descendants of his would appear later, and among them Bṛhaduktha is called his son and was a well-known rishi.<sup>9</sup> 'Vāmadeva' consecrated Durmukha Pāñcāla.<sup>10</sup> Other references to 'Vāmadeva' are quite vague.<sup>11</sup>

The next noted Āngirasa was Śaradvant, son of a Gautama,<sup>12</sup> who married Ahalyā,<sup>13</sup> sister of king Divodāsa of N. Pañcāla (p. 116); and his descendants are given in the N. Pañcāla genealogy,<sup>14</sup> but the pedigree is very greatly abbreviated, only three generations being mentioned from Divodāsa's time to that

It is told again with fanciful additions (id. vii, 30, 21-35). Often alluded to, MBh v, 11, 373: xii, 344, 13205: xiii, 41, 2328; 153, 7218: Lg i, 29, 27: with variations. of Śantanu, namely Śatānanda, Satyadhrti and the twins Kṛpa and Kṛpi, whom Śantanu succoured.<sup>1</sup> All these were Gautamas<sup>2</sup> and therefore descendants of Ucathya.<sup>3</sup> There is nothing to fix the times of Śatānanda and Satyadhrti.

Another Kakṣivant was the author of Rigveda i, 116 and 117, where he calls himself Pajriya Kakṣivant. These hymns and also 118 to 126 are attributed to Kakṣivant Dairghatamasa Auṣija, but this rishi cannot be the former Kakṣivant (ante), because (1) Dirghatamas and his son Kakṣivant lived in the time of Duṣyanta and Bharata (p. 163), (2) this Pajriya Kakṣivant speaks of Divodāsa<sup>4</sup> (who appears to be the king of N. Pañcāla) but not of Pijavana nor Sudās, whence it seems he lived between them, (3) there was a long interval of many kings between Bharata and his descendant Divodāsa (p. 146), and (4) the description and treatment of this young rishi in the story of him and king Svanaya Bhāvayavya<sup>5</sup> does not accord with the base birth of the earlier Kakṣivant. The two Kakṣivants therefore were different persons. This rishi belonged to the family of the Pajras,<sup>6</sup> of whom there is no mention before Dirghatamas. Moreover, it will be shown in the following section that the Kaṇvas did not come into existence till after Ajamīḍha, so that the reference in hymn 117, 8 to Kaṇva and that in i, 18 (attributed to Medhātithi Kāṇva) to 'Kakṣivant who is Auṣija' as a contemporary, both show that Pajriya Kakṣivant could not be the earlier Kakṣivant, but was a later descendant, for Pajra was an Auṣija.<sup>7</sup> Thus there were two Kakṣivants, both Auṣijas, the first son of Dirghatamas in Bharata's time and the second son (or descendant) of Pajra (and also probably a descendant of Dirghatamas) soon after Divodāsa. The Anukramanī and Vedārthadīpikā have confused them. This fixes the time of king Svanaya as between Divodāsa and Sudās.<sup>8</sup>

Kṛpa brings us down to the reign of Śantanu of Hastināpura. A Bharadvāja had his hermitage at Gaṅgādvāra<sup>1</sup> and was of Āngiras' lineage.<sup>2</sup> Prṣata was then king of N. Pañcāla and was his friend. Prṣata's son Drupada and Bharadvāja's son Drona were playmates,<sup>3</sup> but Drupada on becoming king despised Drona. Drona was a great archer and warrior and taught Dhṛtarāṣṭra's sons and the Pāṇḍavas all the art of war.<sup>4</sup> With the Pāṇḍavas' aid he conquered Drupada (p. 116), and apparently became himself king of N. Pañcāla. He married Kṛpi, and their son was Aśvathāman.<sup>5</sup> This Bharadvāja is said to have taught Agniveśa the art of the āgneya weapon, and Agniveśa taught it to Drona.<sup>6</sup>

Other Brhaspatis and Bharadvājas are mentioned, but with want of personal distinction.<sup>7</sup> One Brhaspati gave his daughter Romaśā to king Svanaya Bhāvayavya:<sup>8</sup> another is said to have been the preceptor of king Vasu of Cedi:<sup>9</sup> and another the preceptor of Vyāsa's son Śuka.<sup>10</sup> One Bharadvāja taught Śatruñjaya king of the Sauvīras:<sup>11</sup> another with his son Yavakṛi is connected with Raibhya and his sons Arvāvasu and Parāvasu.<sup>12</sup> Many other Āngiratas, authors of Vedic hymns and others, are mentioned, some of whom were of more or less note, such as Hiranyastūpa, Kutsa, Getama Rāhūgāna<sup>13</sup> and Āpastamba;<sup>14</sup> but there is no sufficient evidence to fix their positions. A Canda Kauśika, called son of Kaksīvant Gautama, is made contemporary with Brhadratha and Jarāsandha, kings of Magadha, by contracting the genealogy.<sup>15</sup>

The genealogy says there were 15 parties (pakṣa) among the Āngirasas, but 16 or 17 names are given, namely, Ayāsya, Utathya (Ucathya), Vāmadeva, Auśīja, Bhāradvāja, Sāṅkṛti, Garga, Kaṇva, Rathītara, Mudgala, Viṣṇuvrddha, Harita, Kapi, Rūkṣa (read Uruksaya), Bharadvāja, Āṛśabha and Kitu. Matsya 196 names all these as gotras except the last two. Of these parties, however, the nine, Sāṅkṛtis to Uruksayas, were not Āngirasas by origin, but sprang from kṣatriyas and were incorporated among the Āngirasas. The Kaṇvas became brahmans straightway, as will be now explained, but all the rest of these became kṣatriyan brahmans, as will be explained in chapter XXIII, and ultimately wholly brahmans. Most of these names are also mentioned as those of celebrated Āngirasa hymn-makers.<sup>2</sup>

Kāṇvas or Kāṇvāyanas.

Among the Āngirasas were the Kāṇvas,<sup>3</sup> and they were an offshoot from the Paurava line, as all the authorities agree, but two distinct points are assigned for their branching off in two different accounts. Both accounts say, Kaṇva had a son Medhātithi, and from Medhātithi were descended the Kāṇvāyanas who were brahmans. One account says, Kaṇva was son of Apratiratha (or Pratiratha), one of the sons of king Matināra (or Rantināra, p. 144) : but the other makes Kaṇva son of Ajamīḍha, a king who was Martināra's successor by some 32 generations. This difference involves a great discrepancy as to the time when Kaṇva lived. Both origins can hardly be true, for it is difficult to believe that Kāṇvas started from 'Medhātithi son of Kaṇva' twice over many generations apart, that is, the double origin of a single brahman family from two persons ages apart. A gotra called Kāṇvas is named among the Vasiṣṭhas,<sup>4</sup> but, even assuming that that unique mention is correct, that gotra appears unknown otherwise ; and the above two accounts undoubtedly refer to one and the same family of Kāṇvas.

The earlier origin is given by the Vāyu, Harivamśa, Viṣṇu and Bhāgavata.<sup>1</sup> The Agni mentions Pratiratha, Kānva and Medhātithi, and the Garuḍa makes Medhātithi son of Pratiratha,<sup>2</sup> but neither say anything about Kānvāyanas, and so do not assert that the Kānvāyanas began at this point.

The later origin from Ajamīḍha is given by the Vāyu, Matsya, Viṣṇu and Garuḍa,<sup>3</sup> which are all in agreement, while the Bhāgavata<sup>4</sup> derives from him the Priyamedhas instead, who also were Āṅgirasas.<sup>5</sup>

The Harivaiśa, Brahma and Agni make Jahnu son of Ajamīḍha and Keśīṇi, and so substitute the Kānyakubja dynasty for the Kānvāyanas, and this is clearly wrong (pp. 99 f.). Their false substitution here shows that they have ousted some other line of descendants, and the only other line at this point mentioned anywhere is the Kānvāyana family, hence the inference is that it originated here. The Bhāgavata moreover in giving Praskaṇva the earlier origin is clearly wrong, because Praskaṇva Kānva was not earlier than Sudās of N. Pañcāla,<sup>6</sup> and therefore was long posterior to the time it assigns him. Of the four Puranas therefore which assert the earlier origin, the Bhāgavata is wrong, the Medhātithih sutas tasya yasmāt Kānvāyanā dvijāḥ.

Dhurya appears to be an adjective, but even if a name does not affect this question. Viṣ iv, 19, 2 agrees closely. Hv 32, 1718 says—

Medhātithih sutas tasya tasmāt Kānvāyanā dvijāḥ.

Similarly Viṣ iv, 19, 10 and Gar 140, 9.

<sup>6</sup> Rigv i, 47, 2, 5, 6 (attributed to him): 45, 3–5, which show he was later than Priyamedha.

Harivamśa highly suspect because of its untrue substitution of the Kānyakubja dynasty at the later point, and the Vāyu and Viṣṇu give both accounts and therefore stultify themselves. The weight of authority then is in favour of the later origin.

Next, there appears to be nothing to show that the Kānvās existed before Ajamīḍha. A Kānva is mentioned in Duṣyanta's time. He adopted Śakuntalā, and Duṣyanta met her in his hermitage and married her, but this Kānva is expressly called a Kāśyapa (see next chapter), and so could not be a member of the Kānvās, who were Āṅgiratas. Kānva was his personal name. There is no other mention of any Kānva before Ajamīḍha. On the other hand there were many Kānvās after him, as the Rigveda shows. By the group of synchronisms at page 163, Sobhari Kānva's position has been fixed, and (accepting the Anukramanī's ascriptions of authorship) there are the following indications: Pragātha Kānva was contemporary with Durgaha's grandsons,<sup>1</sup> and so the positions of his father Ghora, brother Kānva and three sons are fixed; Prṣadhra Kānva was contemporary with Dasyavṛka;<sup>2</sup> and Praskānva has been noticed above. Through Kakṣīvant Pajriya (ante) can be placed Devātithi Kānva,<sup>3</sup> Vatsa Kānva,<sup>4</sup> Sadhvamśa Kānva (who was later than Trasadasyu)<sup>5</sup> and Medhātithi Kānva<sup>6</sup>—all later than Ajamīḍha.

It is clear that the Kānvās sprang from Ajamīḍha<sup>7</sup> and not from Matināra's son Apratiratha, and this accords with the fact that both just before and after Ajamīḍha the Paurava line threw off branches which became brahmans, as will be explained in chapter XXIII. The erroneous earlier origin may perhaps be explained by the Harivamśa text. It says Apratiratha's son was Kānva, a king, and quite possibly there was a junior king Kānva then, and afterwards the second line—which is found generally in both accounts and belongs properly to the second, was mistakenly added to the first, especially when Jahnu was foisted in as a son of Ajamīḍha and ousted the Kānvāyanas from their proper place. The Kānvās thus belonged to the Others were earlier and later, as noticed above, and the positions of others can be perceived in a general way through allusions to kings, to themselves and to other persons, but can hardly be particularized.<sup>1</sup>

CHAPTER XX

THE ĀTREYAS

THE mythical rishi Atri has been noticed above (chapter XVI), and the name is also loosely applied to various Ātreyas, as will be noticed. The genealogy of the Ātreyas is given in Brahmanāda iii, 8, 73-86, Vāyu 70, 67-78 and Liṅga i, 63, 68-78; and also partially in connexion with the Paurava dynasty in Brahma 13, 5-14 and Harivāṁśa 31, 1658, 1661-8. All these passages are closely alike and collated suggest the original text. The Matsya (197) gives a list of Ātreyā rishis and gotras. The genealogy is very brief in its range,<sup>2</sup> confuses Prabhākara with the primaeval mythical Atri in making him father of Soma, and explains the names Prabhākara and Svastyātreyā by a brahmanical fable evidently fabricated out of them. So far as it is genealogical it agrees with tradition elsewhere.

Prabhākara, who is called Atri or Ātreyā,<sup>3</sup> is the earliest of this family to whom an historical position is given, namely, that he married the ten daughters of Bhadrāśva or Raudrāśva and Ghṛtāci. Bhadrāśva, as he is called in two Puranas,<sup>4</sup> or Raudrāśva, as he is generally called,<sup>5</sup> was an early Paurava king; the Vāyu, Matsya and Bhāgavata name his queen as Ghṛtāci;<sup>6</sup> and the Vāyu, Brahma and Harivamśa add, their ten daughters married the Ātreyas. Prabhākara's position is therefore defined. The genealogy says he had ten sons, called the Svastyātreyas,<sup>1</sup> and from him the best Ātreyas were descended. Chief among his Svastyātreyas (not sons) were two famous rishis Datta and Durvāsas.<sup>2</sup>

Datta Ātreyas, or Dattātreyas as he is generally called,<sup>3</sup> is always connected in tradition with the great Haihaya king Arjuna Kārtavīrya, who propitiated him and was favoured by him.<sup>4</sup> He was therefore, from this position, a descendant (not son) of Prabhākara. In late or brahmanical stories however he is wrongly introduced at other times.<sup>5</sup> He is said to have been placid, beneficent and unblemished,<sup>6</sup> and is regarded as the fourth incarnation of Viṣṇu;<sup>7</sup> yet he is sometimes described as addicted to sensual pleasures and spirituous liquor.<sup>8</sup> It is said he had a son Nimi, who was the first to institute the śrāddha.<sup>9</sup>

Durvāsas Ātreyas is called Datta's brother,<sup>10</sup> but his position is not definite, because he is not certainly connected with any king, and he appears often in tales, introduced at all stages of traditional history, especially in brahmanical stories.<sup>11</sup> He is nearly always presented as a very irascible and furious rishi,<sup>12</sup> and his character is well taken off in a story about Kṛṣṇa.<sup>1</sup> Curses imprecated by him serve at times to explain pitiable misfortunes and hardly-merited sufferings.<sup>2</sup> He is called an incarnation of Siva.<sup>3</sup> No gotras appear to have claimed descent from him.

The genealogy says that among gotras descended from Datta four were widely renowned, named after their founders, Śyāvāśva, Mudgala (or Pratvasa), Balāraka (or Vāgbhūtaka or Vavalgu) and Gaviṣṭhira. The Matsya mentions as gotra names, Śyāvāśva and Gaviṣṭhira (197, 5, 7, 8), but not the second and third. I have found nothing to elucidate Mudgala. Six Ātreyas were hymn-makers,<sup>4</sup> Atri, Arcanānas, Śyāvāśva, Gaviṣṭhira, Balgūtaka (or Avihotra, or Karṇaka), and Pūrvātīthi. The fifth is plainly the same as the third gotra, but it is difficult to fix the correct name.

Arcanānas was an Ātreyā and Śyāvāśva was his son. Both are mentioned in the Rigveda. Many hymns are attributed to Śyāvāśva<sup>5</sup> and one to his son Andhīgu.<sup>6</sup> Arcanānas and Śyāvāśva sacrificed for king Rathavīti Dārbhya, and Śyāvāśva married his daughter. Contemporaries then were Taranta and Purumīdha, both of whom are said to have been sons of Vidadaśva.<sup>7</sup> In two of those hymns Śyāvāśva mentions Trasadasyu,<sup>8</sup> who would be the Trasadasyu mentioned in other hymns and whose position has been fixed above (p. 163). This fixes the position of Arcanānas and Śyāvāśva as soon after his time.

Other Ātreyas are mentioned, such as the 'Atri' (one or several), who received wealth from Tryarūṇa, Trasadasyu and Aśvamedha, and also from king Rauśama,<sup>9</sup> and whose position (but not name or names) is fixed accordingly (p. 163) : also a Babhru, who was priest to Rnaiñcaya.<sup>10</sup>

The Kāsyapas.

The accounts of the mythical Kāsyapas have been noticed in chapter XVI. Two so-called vāmśas of the Kāsyapas are found, one of which is wholly mythical and has been noticed there. The other deals with historical members of the Kāsyapa brahman family and is given by four Puranas.<sup>1</sup> Their versions are based on a common original, and are closely alike, but the Kūrma has introduced some variations, which do not however materially alter the purport. The Vāyu, Brahmānda and Liṅga collated suggest the original reading. The Matsya (199) gives a long list of rishis and gotras.

The genealogy says that Kāsyapa had two sons Vatsāra and Asita. Vatsāra begot Nidhruva and Raibhya. Nidhruva married Sumedhas, daughter of Cyavana and Sukanyā, and was the progenitor of the Kunḍapāyins. Raibhya was progenitor of the Raibhyas. Asita married Ekaparṇā and their son was Devala, best of the Śāṇḍilyas.<sup>2</sup> But this genealogy is hopelessly wrong, as will appear from a chronological survey of Kāsyapa rishis who are mentioned.

Vatsāra (or Vatsara, as it appears sometimes) is not mentioned in the Vedic Index.<sup>3</sup> Kāsyapa, he, Naidhruva, Raibhya, Asita and Devala were the six Kāsyapa brahmavādins,<sup>4</sup> and he is one of the seven rishis now said to be stationed in the sky.<sup>5</sup> His alleged son Nidhruva's wife cannot have been the daughter of Cyavana and Sukanyā, for they belonged to the very earliest age, and the reading Sukanyāyām should probably be tu kanyā yā, meaning that his wife was daughter of a Cyavana, who may have been the king of N. Pañcāla, as will appear in the next paragraph. A Naidhruvi is once mentioned in Vedic literature, and a Kunḍapāyin also.<sup>6</sup> A Nidhruvi is the reputed author of Rigveda ix, 63. Raibhya<sup>7</sup> (or Rebhya), the name of the other son assigned to Vatsāra, is a patronymic, and should no doubt be Rebha; and if so, he may be the Rebha Kāśyapa who is the reputed author of Rigveda viii, 97,<sup>1</sup> and perhaps also the Rebha who is called a rishi<sup>2</sup> and mentioned several times in the hymns.<sup>3</sup> Nothing can be fixed about his time, except that he was prior to Kaksīvant Pajriya, who mentions him.<sup>4</sup> This synchronism shows that the Cyavana mentioned above cannot be the primaeval rishi and is more probably the N. Pañcāla king (p. 148). The other persons named in the genealogy will be noticed in turn.

The earliest time at which a Kāśyapa is mentioned is that of Rāma Jāmadagnya, who, according to brahmanic fable, offered a great sacrifice with Kāśyapa as his upādhyāya (p. 200).

The next Kāśyapa is Kaṇva Kāśyapa, in whose hermitage Śakuntalā dwelt.<sup>5</sup> She married the Paurava king Dusyanta and was mother of the famous king Bharata.<sup>6</sup> ‘Kaṇva’ is said to have been the chief priest at Bharata’s sacrifices,<sup>7</sup> and Bharata gave him gifts;<sup>8</sup> and he is no doubt this Kaṇva (or perhaps his son). The Kaṇva family had not come into existence then as shown in the last chapter.

The next Kāśyapa was the progenitor of the Śāṇḍilyas.<sup>9</sup> His position is not known, but they existed in the time of Dilipa II Khaṭvāṅga, king of Ayodhyā, because an old verse says that a Śāṇḍilya sacrificed for him;<sup>10</sup> and they would be even earlier, if the statement is reliable, that Bhūmanyu, probably the Paurava king, gave food to a Śāṇḍilya.<sup>11</sup> These allusions show that the genealogy is wrong if it means, as it seems to mean, that the Śāṇḍilyas sprang from Asita or Devala, who were far later.

The next Kāśyapa was Vibhāṇḍaka, who had his hermitage on the R. Kauśikī (the modern Kosi in N. Bihar). His son was Next would probably come Nidhruva and Rebha as noticed above.

The next famous Kāsyapa was the rishi Asita.<sup>4</sup> His wife was Ekaparṇā (p. 69), and their son was Devala.<sup>5</sup> This portion is given in the genealogy. Devala is often called Asita Devala,<sup>6</sup> and sometimes even simply Asita;<sup>7</sup> hence it is not always clear which is meant, and he must be distinguished from other Devalas.<sup>8</sup> The genealogy says that Devala, and therefore Asita presumably, were Śāṇḍilyas, thus indicating that it is imperfect, and that they must have had an ancestor Śāṇḍila, who lived much earlier, as pointed out above. Asita is made contemporary with Bhīṣma, for he had asked for Satyavatī in marriage;<sup>9</sup> Devala with the Pāṇḍavas,<sup>10</sup> and Devala's younger brother (cousin?) Dhaumya

The genealogy says there were three groups among the Kāśyapas, the Śāṇḍilyas, Naidhruvas and Raibhyas.

CHAPTER XXI

THE VIŚVĀMITRAS

THE family of the Viśvāmitras was founded by the great Viśvāmitra, and the story about him has been narrated above (p. 205). His brahmanhood was disputed by the great Devarāj Vasiṣṭha, and he succeeded in establishing it, with the result that he held a position independent of all other brahmans, and so founded an independent brahman family, the only separate brahman family founded by a kṣatriya.<sup>5</sup> His position has been fixed above (p. 152). The various Viśvāmitras who will be noticed are however often confused, and sometimes regarded as one and the same person,<sup>6</sup> with the result that no allusions occur which can well suggest names to distinguish them. An account of Viśvāmitra and his sons is given by four Puranas<sup>7</sup> and the texts should be collated. Lists of the gotras are also given by various authorities and will be noticed.

<sup>1</sup> MBh i, 183, 6914, 6918–19; &c.: xv, 23, 632. P. C. Roy's translation of xiv, 64, 1903 makes Agniveṣya his (Yudhiṣṭhira's) priest, and says Āgniveṣya was another name of Dhaumya: but purohita and Āgniveṣya are distinct, and the rendering should be 'his priest' (i.e. Dhaumya) 'and Āgniveṣya'.

Viśvāmitra had many sons, chief among them being Madhucchandas, Kati (or Kata?) Rṣabha, Renu, Aṣṭaka<sup>1</sup> and Gūlava.<sup>2</sup> He also adopted the Bhārgava Śunahṣepa with the name Devarāta and made him the chief of all his sons.<sup>3</sup> Aṣṭaka appears to have succeeded Viśvāmitra in the kingdom of Kānyakubja (p. 146), but all the rest were entirely brahmans. Accounts concur (though differing in details) that Viśvāmitra's sons did not all accept Devarāta's headship; and it is said that Viśvāmitra cursed those who repudiated it to become dog-eaters or mlecchas,<sup>4</sup> such as Andhras, Pundras and Śabaras.<sup>5</sup> The Rāmāyaṇa says absurdly that he cursed all his sons, because they refused to offer themselves as victims in Śunahṣepa's stead, to be dog-eaters dwelling like the Vasiṣṭhas among the lowest castes.<sup>6</sup> This is certainly wrong, for Madhucchandas and others were not degraded. There are allusions at times to degraded Viśvāmitras,<sup>7</sup> but it is difficult to say what that means,<sup>8</sup> and it is distinctly stated that all his sons were munis who declared sacred lore.<sup>9</sup>

The Bhāgavata says<sup>10</sup>—Madhucchandas was the middle son. The elder sons resented Devarāta's position, but Madhucchandas and the younger sons accepted it; so Viśvāmitra blessed them and Devarāta as 'Kuśikas', and they constituted the Kauśika gotra, while the elder sons were separate and known as 'Viśvāmitras'.

<sup>8</sup> It may have been developed out of the story that a Viśvāmitra, compelled by hunger, once ate dog's flesh from a cāṇḍāla's hand; Br 93, 5-24; Manu x, 108; MBh xii, 141, 5344-5417. But more probably it means that some of Viśvāmitra's descendants became priests to non-Aryan tribes and so degenerated to the level of their clients. It is said he created yātudhānas, MBh xiii, 3, 4. See Paulastyas, note, next chapter.

But tradition hardly seems to acknowledge this distinction, for the Viśvāmitras generally seem to have been known as Kuśikas and Kauśikas, after Viśvāmitra's grandfather king Kuśika (p. 144).

The next Viśvāmitra was the father of Śakuntalā, Duṣyanta's queen and Bharata's mother (ante). Nothing particular is said about him and he is generally confused with the first Viśvāmitra,<sup>1</sup> though there was a considerable interval between them (pp. 144, 146). His position is therefore fixed. A Viśvāmitra is next mentioned in the story of Kalmāsapāda Saudāsa, king of Ayodhyā, but he appears to have been mistakenly introduced into it through confusing this Saudāsa with Śudāsa (p. 208). A later Viśvāmitra is introduced in the Rāmāyana, as obtaining Rāma's help to destroy the demon Tārakā, and as narrating various wonderful legends to Rāma.<sup>2</sup> There were of course Viśvāmitras at that time, but his appearance there is doubtful and seems intended to glorify Rāma.<sup>3</sup> Moreover, he is there wrongly identified with the first Viśvāmitra,<sup>4</sup> and the brahmanic fable of the contest between that Viśvāmitra and Vasiṣṭha is narrated as concerning him.<sup>5</sup>

An important Viśvāmitra was the rishi who was connected with Sudās (Sudasa) king of N. Pañcāla (p. 148), and was a rival of the seventh Vasiṣṭha noticed in chapter XVIII. Both these rishis were priests to Sudās, as the Rigveda shows,<sup>6</sup> and one appears to have ousted the other; and the point for consideration here is which was first Sudās's priest, and which afterwards. It is said that Vasiṣṭha consecrated Sudās as king,<sup>7</sup> and this if accepted would settle the question. Tradition says that this Vasiṣṭha's son Śakti was killed by Sudās's servants through Viśvāmitra's instigation (p. 208); and there are two facts, first, that there is no hymn by any Vasiṣṭha in praise of Sudās's son Sahadeva or grandson Somaka; and secondly, hymn iii, 33, attributed to Viśvāmitra, describes the Bharatas as crossing the rivers Śutudrī (Sutlej) and Vipāś (Beas), and appears to refer to Sudās and his Bharatas, because no Viśvāmitra is said to have been priest to the other Bhārata line, the Pauravas of Hastinā-pura; that is, it appears to refer to Sudās's campaign against Saṁvaraṇa westwards into the Panjab. These considerations corroborate the point that Sudās's first priest was Vasiṣṭha, that Vasiṣṭha's son Śakti was killed through Viśvāmitra's instigation, and that ultimately Vasiṣṭha departed to Saṁvaraṇa and Viśvāmitra became Sudās's priest.<sup>1</sup> Manu's story (p. 209) may help to explain how Viśvāmitra ousted Vasiṣṭha.

'Viśvāmitra' is said to have had a son Raibhya,<sup>2</sup> who had two sons Arvāvasu and Parāvasu.<sup>3</sup> They are connected in stories with 'Bharadvāja' and his son Yavakṛi, and a king Brhaddyumna,<sup>4</sup> and with Vasu king of Cedi and a Raibhya Dhanus;<sup>5</sup> and Parāvasu with Rāma Jāmadagnya;<sup>6</sup> but these allegations are inconsistent brahmanical fables.<sup>7</sup> The river Kauśikī (Kosi in N. Behar) was said to have been specially connected with 'Viśvāmitra', and named after his patronymic Kauśika.<sup>8</sup> Other references to 'Viśvāmitra' occur,<sup>9</sup> but are uncertain, especially as the different Viśvāmitras and Kauśikas were confused.

Viśvāmitra's descendants formed many gotras, and more lists are given of them than in any other brahman family. Four Puranas contain lists, which are all different versions of one and the same original list.<sup>10</sup> The Matsya (198) gives a longer list, which agrees with those lists in ten names only. The epic also gives a long list of rishis in this family, and only some fifteen names practically agree with those in the former lists.<sup>11</sup> The gotra names generally found in these lists are—Babhrū, Devarāta, Gālava, Hiranyākṣa, Jābāla, Kariṣī, Kuśika or Kauśika, Lohita, Madhucchandas, Pāṇini, Saindhavāyana, Sālāṅkāyana, Suśruta, Tūrakāyana, Yājñavalkya.<sup>12</sup>

Agastyas.

THERE is no genealogy of the Agastyas, and the Matsya alone (202) gives a list of gotras, which it calls their varṇa. ‘Agastya’ appears in various stories at various times from the earliest age down to the Pāṇḍavas’ time,<sup>1</sup> and there is great indefiniteness about the Agastyas.

Fable, which has been noticed in connexion with Vasiṣṭha Maitrāvaraṇa (chapter XVIII), gives ‘Agastya’ an origin with ‘Vasiṣṭha’ in making them both born in a water-jar, sons of the two gods Mitra and Varuṇa, ‘Agastya’ being thus ‘Vasiṣṭha’s younger brother.<sup>2</sup> Hence ‘Agastya’ had the patronymic Maitrāvaraṇi,<sup>3</sup> and the names Kumbhayoni,<sup>4</sup> Kumbhajanman<sup>5</sup> and other synonyms.<sup>6</sup> Maitrāvaraṇi really meant ‘son (or descendant) of Mitrāvaraṇa’, but was taken to mean ‘son of Mitra and Varuṇa’,<sup>7</sup> (as explained in chapter XVIII), and so the common patronymic of ‘Vasiṣṭha’ and ‘Agastya’ led to the fable that they were begotten together; and it is noteworthy that no reason is given why ‘Agastya’ was so born, such as is given for ‘Vasiṣṭha’.

Kumbhayoni may have been a real name, for queer names were not uncommon, as witness Trṇabindu, Śunahṣepa and many others, and it can be matched with Urjayoni, the name of a son of Viśvāmitra.<sup>8</sup> If so, it would naturally have led to the allegation that he was born in a jar, just as Vasiṣṭha’s name Kunḍina did (ante) ; but it seems more likely to have been coined out of the fable, thus—‘Vasiṣṭha’ and ‘Agastya’ were both Maitrāvaruṇa, interpreted as ‘son of Mitra and Varuṇa’. ‘Vasiṣṭha’ was Kuṇḍina, interpreted to mean ‘connected with a jar’, therefore Agastya must also have been their son born at the same time and in the same way, and so was Kumbha-yoni. This is illustrated by Drona, whose name gave rise to a precisely similar explanation,<sup>1</sup> whence he also is styled Kumbhayoni<sup>2</sup> and Kumbhasambhava.<sup>3</sup> Hence the name would seem to have been devised out of the fable, and it may be noted that ‘Vasiṣṭha’ is never called Kumbhayoni, because he had the name Kuṇḍina ; and the fable was also utilized to explain Mānya, the patronymic of an Agastya.

As noticed above, the stories in which ‘Agastya’ is introduced at various times are generally brahmanic stories, unsupported otherwise, and worthless chronologically. The only Agastya, to whom a genuine historical position is assigned, is the rishi who married Lopāmudrā, and whose place has been fixed above (p. 168). He is sometimes called Kumbhayoni and Maitrāvaruṇa.<sup>4</sup> Their son was, it is said, Dr̥ḍhasyu, who was called Idhmavāha also.<sup>5</sup> Dr̥ḍhasyu’s name is variously given as Dr̥ḍhāṣya, Dr̥ḍhāyus and Dr̥ḍhadyumna ; and Idhmavāha as Vidhmavāha and Indrabāhu.<sup>6</sup> They were however different persons,<sup>7</sup> because the former is no doubt Dr̥ḍhacyuta,<sup>8</sup> the reputed author of Rigveda ix, 25 ; and Idhmavāha was his son, for as the reputed author of ix, 26 he is called Dārḍhacyuta. ‘Agastya’ and these two are said to have been the most famous Agastis.<sup>9</sup>

The Veda throws very little light on the Agastyas because it mentions them only by their family name Agastya. ‘Agastya’ is said to be the author of hymns i, 165 to 191, but this is only the family name and no doubt includes several Agastyas, for, while to the Agastya who married Lopāmudrā would belong hymn 179, the author of hymn 185 apparently calls himself Sumedhas (verse 10), and the Sumedhases were a gotra among the Agastyas.<sup>10</sup> Agastyas are alluded to sometimes,<sup>1</sup> but very few are mentioned by name besides those noticed above.<sup>2</sup> One was Māna, for the author of hymn 189 calls himself Māna's son; the Mānas are mentioned and the patronymic Mānya occurs.<sup>3</sup> Māndārya is probably another patronymic pointing to a Mandāra, and Māna and Mandāra were in the same line of descent because the author of hymns 165 and 166 calls himself Māndārya Mānya,<sup>4</sup> and it is said that Mānya was Maitrāvaruṇi, son (or descendant) of Mitrāvaruṇa.<sup>5</sup>

There is nothing to show when or how the Agastyas arose. The fable noticed above connects 'Agastya' with 'Vasiṣṭha', but that seems merely a fabrication from the fact that a Vasiṣṭha and an Agastya both had the same patronymic Maitrāvaruṇa. Tradition generally connects 'Agastya' with the southern region<sup>6</sup> and even with Ceylon.<sup>7</sup> Thus 'Agastya' met Lopāmudrā at the great tīrtha on the river Sindhu,<sup>8</sup> that is the Sindh, a southern tributary of the Jumna. 'Agastya' is called 'lord of the southern region',<sup>9</sup> and is sometimes said to dwell on Mt. Malaya<sup>10</sup> at the extreme south. Canopus, the brightest star in the southern hemisphere, bears his name. Fables also connect 'Agastya' with the south, such as his altering the height of the Vindhya Mts.,<sup>11</sup> the story of Ilvala and Vātāpi,<sup>12</sup> and others.<sup>13</sup> He had a hermitage apparently near Mt. Vaidūrya,<sup>14</sup> (the western part of the Satpura range), another called Saubhadra on the southern ocean,<sup>15</sup> and another among the Pāṇḍyas.<sup>16</sup> But the Agastyas spread elsewhere, and so mention is made of 'Agastya' in connexion with the Jumna, Prayāga and other places,<sup>17</sup> and Gayā appropriated some of the fame of Agastya and Lopāmudrā.<sup>18</sup>

The Paulastyas.

An account which professes to give an historical explanation of Pulastya's offspring is found in five Puranas.<sup>1</sup> It derives them from the royal line of Vaiśāli. Narisyanta, son of Marutta, had a son Dama (p. 147). His (eighth) successor was Trīnabindu, who was king at the third mouth of the Tretā age (p. 178). Trīnabindu's daughter was Ilavilā and he gave her to Pulastya. Their son was the rishi Viśravas Ailavila.<sup>2</sup> Viśravas had four wives, a Br̥haspati's<sup>3</sup> daughter Devavarnī, Mālyavant's daughters Puśpotkaṭā and Vākā, and Mālin's daughter Kaikasi. Viśravas's son by Devavarnī was Kubera Vaiśravāṇa,<sup>4</sup> and Kubera had four sons Nalakūbara, Rāvana,<sup>5</sup> Kumbhakarṇa, and Vibhīṣaṇa and a daughter Śurpanakhā. Kaikasi bore Daśagrīva and other sons; Puśpotkaṭā bore Khara and other sons; and Vākā various sons. Pulastya's offspring (putting aside Kubera) were Rākṣasas, and the Matsya says (202, 12–13) that Pulastya, seeing that, adopted Agastya's son (who is not named)<sup>6</sup> and so the Paulastyas were Āgastyas.

The account continues. These Āgastyas were thus classed along with the great body of Rākṣasas, and they together with another group called Vaiśvāmitras or Kauśikas were reckoned Paulastya Rākṣasas.<sup>7</sup> How the Vaiśvāmitras or Kauśikas came to be treated as such is not explained (but see chapter XXI, note). The Paulastyas thus comprised three groups, Pulastya's own descendants, the Āgastyas and the Vaiśvāmitras or Kauśikas; and Kubera was king of all the Yaksas and of the Āgastyas and Vaiśvāmitras, who

<sup>5</sup> As regards Rāvana's relations, see also Rām iii, 48, 2–5; 50, 9; 68, 16: iv, 58, 19: v, 23, 6–8: vi, 19, 10; 35, 6.

were Paulastya Rāksasas, cruel brahma-rākṣasas,<sup>1</sup> who studied the Veda and performed austerities and religious exercises.<sup>2</sup> There were four other groups who were reckoned Rāksasas, three of which were active in the day time, but the Paulastyas, Āgastyas, Kauśikas and Nairṛtas were active at night.<sup>3</sup> Wise Āgastya brahma-rākṣasas are said to attend on Kauberaka (Kubera?) on Hiranyaśrīnga.<sup>4</sup>

It is noteworthy that all the Paulastyas (except Kubera, who was reckoned a god) belonged to S. India and Ceylon, and that Pulastya is made a contemporary of Trṇabindu, whose position has been fixed (p. 178), so that Pulastya was not a primaeval rishi, and a definite time is assigned for the origin of the Paulastyas.<sup>5</sup> As already shown, Viśvāmitra and Agastya existed before that time, so Vaiśvāmitras and Āgastyas could have been incorporated among the Paulastyas. At the same time it must be noted that some passages connect these Paulastya Rāksasas with the Himalayan region also,<sup>6</sup> and Kubera with Ceylon<sup>7</sup> as well as with that region.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This appears to be an epithet of the Āgastyas and Vaiśvāmitras, and to mean Rāksasas who had been or were descended from brahmans, or brahmans who had allied themselves with Rāksasas. Cf. also Vā 69, 195–6; Bd iii, 7, 162–3. Rām i, 8, 17 and 12, 18 speak of 'wise brahma-rākṣasas'.

<sup>5</sup> This does not harmonize with the story that, when Arjuna Kārtavīrya captured 'Rāvana' and imprisoned him at Māhiṣmatī, Pulastya appealed for leniency, and Arjuna then released 'Rāvana'; for Arjuna was much earlier than Trṇabindu: Vā 94, 35–6; Bd iii, 69, 35–7; Hv 33, 1876–8; Br 13, 184–7; Mat 43, 37–9; Pad v, 12, 136–8. Fancifully elaborated, Rām vii, 31 to 33. Rāvana is probably not a personal name, but a Sanskritized form of the Tamil word irēivai or iraiavan, 'God, king, sovereign, lord' (JRAS, 1914, p. 285); and if so, Arjuna may have captured a Dravidian rāvana or king, and Pulastya may have been introduced afterwards (Viś iv, 11, 6 says nothing about Pulastya), when the Rāvasas were confused.

Paulahas.

Pulaha's fabulous progeny has been noticed (chapter XVI), but the Matsya says (202, 10-11) that Pulaha had three sons (who are not named<sup>1</sup>) and, not being pleased with them, adopted Agastya's son Dr̥ḍhāsyā (that is, Dr̥ḍhacyuta, ante), and so the Paulahas were Āgastyas. The Padma says (vi, 218, 62-3) that he begot a son Dambholi, who had been Agastya formerly.<sup>2</sup> No further particulars are given of the Paulahas.

Kratus.

Kratu has been noticed (chapter XVI), and the Matsya says (202, 8-9) that he adopted 'Agastya's' son Idhmavāha (ante), and the Kratus therefore were Āgastyas.

CHAPTER XXIII

KṢATRIYAN BRAHMANS

A PECULIAR combination of the kṣatriya and brahman, of the prince and priest, has now to be noticed, in that branches of royal families became brahmans at times and yet retained their kṣatriya status, and were described as kṣatropetā dvijātayah, which may be rendered 'kṣatriyan brahmans'. This happened in several families and can be best studied among the junior branches of the Pauravas after Bharata's time.

Much has been written about early contests between brahmans and kṣatriyas, and Muir has noticed most of them,<sup>3</sup> but the subject may be discriminated more properly thus. Contests were of three kinds, first, where a king slighted, quarrelled with, injured or killed a brahman; secondly, where he, as a kṣatriya, arrogated the right to perform religious ceremonies himself and so disputed or infringed brahmanic privileges; and thirdly, where a kṣatriya sought to become a brahman. The vast majority of contests mentioned were of the first kind. Very few of the second kind are recorded, and they arose only in later times when the brahmans had established their right to perform sacrifices, such as king Janamejaya III's dispute,<sup>1</sup> for it seems that in early times kings themselves sacrificed. These two kinds were the analogues of disputes and contests in Europe between the temporal and spiritual powers. The third is the only kind that concerns us here, and of this kind there is really none, as far as I am aware, except the great contest between Vasiṣṭha and Viśvāmitra. That has been described above (p. 205) and was a personal quarrel, not a general denial of a kṣatriya's right to become a brahman, and Vasiṣṭha's denial of Viśvāmitra's brahmanhood was simply a means of revenge.<sup>2</sup> The brahmans in later times distorted the story into ridiculous fables, which extolled their pretensions.

There was no general denial of a kṣatriya's right in those early times to become a brahman.<sup>3</sup> There are abundant instances of kings' becoming rishis, rājarṣis, without any difficulty, and that was tantamount to becoming brahmans. The earliest is that of Nahuṣa's son Yati, who relinquished the kingdom to his brother Yayāti and became a brahman muni.<sup>4</sup> Others prior to Viśvāmitra were Māndhāṭa, Kāśya and Gr̥tsamada, and after his time there were numerous instances, as will be shown.<sup>5</sup>

The term kṣatropetā dvijātayah was used comprehensively sometimes, as shown in a passage which enumerates many of them.<sup>6</sup> There it includes three classes: kṣatriyas who relinquished their own status and became brahmans, such as Viśvāmitra; others of lower rank who became brahmans, such as Kakṣīvant (p. 220); and kṣatriyas who became brahmans and still retained their kṣatriya status, that is, 'kṣatriyan brahmans', and it is this class to which the term more properly and mainly applies. They developed in both the Solar and Lunar lines, rarely and only in the earliest times in the former, oftener and at various periods in the latter. They were real brahmans with the kṣatriya status superadded.<sup>7</sup> There is no suggestion that there was any difficulty in the assumption of brahmanhood in such cases, and hymns composed by such persons were admitted into the Rigveda. Princes who became rishis in the earliest times are often described as having qualified themselves by long austerities, but, apart from the general statement about austerities in the passage cited above, there is no indication that these 'kṣatriyan brahmans' underwent any such initiation, and it seems they merely assumed brahmanhood. In the Lunar line those after Bharata's time could claim brahman ancestry, because they were descended from the Bharadvāja, whom Bharata adopted as son and who continued his lineage (p. 159 f.), so that they could regard themselves as kṣatriyas or brahmans or both combined.<sup>1</sup>

There were two differences between these kṣatriyan brahmans and Viśvāmitra. First, he relinquished his kṣatriyahood and kingdom to become a brahman: they relinquished nothing and assumed brahmanhood. The combination however was not stable, and the members gravitated to one or the other status; thus the eldest princes, who succeeded to the throne, became mainly kṣatriya, and their successors gradually dropped their brahmanic character, while among the junior scions the latter predominated and they developed into pure brahmans. The other difference was that Viśvāmitra established a separate brahman family as noticed above, but these kṣatriyan brahmans were admitted into, and their descendants formed gotras in, one or other of the great brahman families, especially the Āngirasas and Bhārgavas.

There is no good reason to distrust the tradition about these kṣatriyan brahmans, as has been shown above (p. 124). Even the Bhāgavata, avowedly a brahmanic Purana, acknowledges the origin of the Urukṣayas, Kapis, Gārgyas, Priyamedhas and Maudgalyas from the Paurava dynasty,<sup>2</sup> as will be shown. That brahmans sprang from this dynasty is alluded to in other passages.<sup>3</sup>

KṣATRIYAN BRAHMANS IN THE SOLAR RACE.

The texts say the Viṣṇuvṛddhas and Hāritas were kṣatriyan brahmans<sup>4</sup> and joined the Āṅgirasas; accordingly both are mentioned in the vāniṣa of the Āṅgirasas.<sup>5</sup> Nothing more appears to be said about them.<sup>6</sup>

Descended from Manu's son Nābhāga was Rathitara (p. 98). His sons, born kṣatriyas, became Āṅgirasas, and the Rathitara gotras were kṣatriyan brahmans.<sup>7</sup> Accordingly they are named

<sup>2</sup> Lg i, 65, 39–43. Kūr i, 20, 25–8. Vā 88, 71–5 and 79 b and c (see p. 81). Bd iii, 63, 72–3 (incomplete). Almost similarly, Viṣ iv, 2, 19; 3, 5, 12: Bhāg ix, 6, 34–8; 7, 1–4. Cf. Gar i, 138, 22–3.

<sup>3</sup> All these were hymn-makers among the Āṅgirasas, Vā 59, 99, 102: Bd ii, 32, 108, 112: Mat 145, 102, 106. Nābhāka Kānya imitated Māndhāṭṛ's manner of praise, Rigv viii, 40, 12; and x, 134 is attributed to Māndhāṭṛ. The Kānyas were Āṅgirasas, chap. XIX.

Rathītarāṇām pravarāḥ kṣatropetā dvijātayah

Bhāg ix, 6, 1–3 quotes this verse incorrectly and makes the Rathītaras sons of Rathītarā's wife and Āṅgiras; and the commentator on Viṣ repeats the misconception. Cf. Vā 91, 117: Bd iii, 66, 88.

among the Āngiratas.<sup>1</sup> It has been shown that the Āngiratas hardly appeared as a full brahman family until the time of Karandhama, the Vaiśala king (pp. 157 f.); but when the Rathitaras were incorporated among them is uncertain; and it is possible that the Rathitara line of ancestry has been greatly abbreviated. They are rarely referred to.

KṣATRIYAN BRAHMANS IN THE LUNAR RACE.

Śaunakas and Ārṣṭiṣenās.

The first instance occurred in the Kāśi dynasty. Sunahotra, one of the earliest kings, had three sons, Kāśa, Śala and Gr̥tsamada. Gr̥tsamada's son was Śunaka, and from him were descended the Śaunakas, who comprised all four castes. Śala's son was Ārṣṭiṣena. The Śaunakas and Ārṣṭiṣenās were kṣatriyan brahmans.<sup>2</sup> 'Son' here means probably 'descendant', but even so, this statement implies a very early time for these two gotras. It is not said that they were admitted into any of the great brahman families. This Ārṣṭiṣena is the rishi mentioned above (p. 165, note 11). There was a Śaunaka among the Bhārgavas (p. 201) who was different, and these Śaunakas would seem to be the gotra named among the Ātreyas.<sup>3</sup> Nothing more, however, definite is said about these two sub-families.

Bhāratas.

It has been pointed out (p. 159) that king Bharata adopted the Āngirasa rishi Bharadvāja as his son, and Bharadvāja begot Vitatha who continued the Paurava dynasty, and consequently that the Bhāratas could assert either kṣatriya paternity or brahman paternity or both combined.<sup>4</sup> Some of the junior branches did avail themselves of this option, and their development into kṣatriyan brahmans and brahmans occurred at three stages.

The first arose among Vitatha's near successors. The portion of the genealogy which explains this is found in four Puranas.<sup>5</sup> The oldest and best versions are in the Matsya and Vāyu, which are derived from a common original, and show variations chiefly due to corruptions. The Viṣṇu in prose agrees closely with them, and the Bhāgavata repeats the account fairly clearly. The other accounts either say nothing, or speak briefly and incorrectly, in no case noticing the brahmanic developments.

By collating the Matsya and Vāyu (the former being the better), and using the Viṣṇu and Bhāgavata for comparison, a version that seems fairly trustworthy can be obtained and is given below.<sup>1</sup> The genealogical tree obtained therefrom is given on p. 112. It is definitely stated that from the three younger sons of Bhuvamanyu sprang four brahman sub-families, from Mahāvīrya the Urukṣayas and Kāpyas, from Nara<sup>2</sup> the Sāṅkṛtis, and from Garga<sup>3</sup> the Gargas or Gārgyas, that the Urukṣayas became brahmans, and that the Gargas, Sāṅkṛtis and Kāpyas were kṣatriyan brahmans. Even the brahmanical Bhāgavata says plainly that Gārgya from a kṣatriya became a brahman. These sub-families will now be considered separately.

Sāṅkṛtis or Sāṅkṛtyas.

The Sāṅkṛtis were kṣatriyan brahmans and joined the Āṅgirasas, and they are named as a gotra among the Āṅgirasas,<sup>4</sup> and Sāṅkṛti is named as a hymn-maker among them.<sup>1</sup> Of the two Sāṅkṛtis mentioned Rantideva was a famous king (pp. 39–42) renowned for liberality and hospitality.<sup>2</sup> His kingdom was on the R. Carmanvatī (Chambal), for that river was connected with him;<sup>3</sup> it embodied his fame, and his capital was Daśapura.<sup>4</sup> With him the kṣatriya status predominated, but his kingdom disappeared, and his descendants would seem to have become brahmans.

The other Sāṅkṛti's name is given as Guruvīrya (Vāyu), Guruḍhī (Matsya), Guru (Bhāgavata) and Ruciradhī (Viṣṇu). He is no doubt the same rishi who is named among the Āṅgirasas as Guruvitā<sup>5</sup> and Gauravīti,<sup>6</sup> and the correct name is Gaurivīti. Rigveda v, 29 is attributed by the Anukramanī to Gaurivīti Śāktya and x, 73 and 74 to Gaurivīti simply, but the Vedārthadīpikā says nothing about the former and ascribes the latter to Gaurivīti Śāktya. If Śāktya refers to Vasiṣṭha's son Śakti (pp. 207 f.), then Gaurivīti Śāktya was a Vasiṣṭha and later than this time.<sup>7</sup> But nothing clear can be decided, because there was also a Śakti among the Āṅgirasas.<sup>8</sup>

Gargas or Gārgyas.

The Gārgyas were a well-known family and were reckoned among the Āṅgirasas, and so also their sub-family of the Sainyas.<sup>9</sup> Garga and Śini are named as hymn-makers among the Āṅgirasas.<sup>10</sup> Various Gargas<sup>11</sup> or Gārgyas are mentioned in tradition; thus, taking them in order, a Gārgya cursed Janamejaya II Pārikṣita for injuring his son (p. 114); another was Vasudeva's purohita, and

Mahāvīrya in the genealogy is called Āhārya in the Matsya version in line 8. The importance of stray readings has been pointed out (p. 83) and Āhārya is supported by another statement which says he was a hymn-maker among the Āṅgirasas.<sup>5</sup> Āhārya would seem therefore to be the better form,<sup>6</sup> but the variation suggests that the name may be corrupt. Rigveda x, 118 is ascribed to Urukṣaya Āmahīya, 'son of Amahīyu', and it seems quite probable that Amahīyu may be the true name here,<sup>7</sup> for Mahāvīrya and Āhārya might be easy corruptions of it.<sup>8</sup>

Urukṣaya and Kapi would seem to be named as hymn-makers among the Āṅgirasas.<sup>9</sup> The genealogy speaks of the Kāpyas as distinct from the Urukṣayas, for it says the Urukṣayas all became brahmans (line 11) and the Kāpyas were ksatriyan brahmans (line 13).<sup>10</sup> Hence it suggests that the descendants of Urukṣaya's two elder sons formed the Urukṣayas, and those of Kapi a distinct gotra. All joined the Āṅgirasas, and so in the Āṅgirasa vamśa is named Urukṣaya,<sup>11</sup> though not Kapi unless Kapibhū stands for it.<sup>12</sup>

The next group of kṣatriyan brahmans arose out of the N. Pañcāla dynasty, which was Bhārata, and is set out above (p. 116).<sup>1</sup> Mudgala's eldest son became a brahman. His descendants, the Mudgalas or Maudgalyas, were kṣatriyan brahmans and joined the Āṅgirasas.<sup>2</sup> His grandson Vadhryaśva and Vadhryaśva's son Divodāsa both exercised priestly functions as the Rigveda shows,<sup>3</sup> and appear to have joined the Bhārgavas, for both of them are named in the Bhārgava vāṁśa.<sup>4</sup> Divodāsa's successor was king Mitrayu who was a brahman, and his son was Maitreya, from whom came the Maitreyas, who were kṣatriyan brahmans and joined the Bhārgavas,<sup>5</sup> and accordingly they were named in the Bhārgava vāṁśa.<sup>6</sup> Neither the Maudgalyas nor the Maitreyas produced any rishi of note. A Maudgalya has been mentioned (p. 171), and three others are alluded to.<sup>7</sup> The Viṣṇu Purana professes to have been declared by Parāśara to a Maitreya. Other Maitreyas are noticed in the Vedic Index.<sup>8</sup>

Vādhryaśvas and Daivodāsas.

Here may be noticed some of the descendants of Vadhryaśva and Divodāsa. Parucchepa Daivodāsi, the reputed author of Rigveda i, 127 to 139 would seem to have been alive with Divodāsa (130, 7) and would therefore have been his son or grandson; and his son or descendant was Anānata, the reputed author of ix, 111. Pratardana Daivodāsi, the reputed author of ix, 96, would seem to have been a near descendant of Divodāsa. Sumitra Vādhryaśva, the author of x, 69 and 70, was a contemporary of king Cyavana Pijavana (p. 120). All these were probably Bhārgavas, as were Vadhryaśva and Divodāsa.

Lastly may be noticed Devāpi Ārṣṭiṣeṇa,<sup>1</sup> the author of hymn x, 98, whose story is often told.<sup>2</sup> He was apparently the eldest grandson of king Pratipa, and Śantanu a younger grandson (p. 165). He was an excellent prince<sup>3</sup> but had a skin disease,<sup>4</sup> and so was excluded from the throne by the opposition of the people which was led by the brahmans,<sup>5</sup> or he declined it in Śantanu's favour.<sup>6</sup> So Śantanu became king. Devāpi departed to the forest in his youth<sup>7</sup> and became a muni, a teacher of the gods.<sup>8</sup> But a twelve-year drought occurred, which was attributed to the supersession, so Śantanu offered him the kingdom;<sup>9</sup> but he declined it, became Śantanu's purohita instead,<sup>10</sup> and composed Rigveda x, 98.<sup>11</sup>

CHAPTER XXIV

ANCIENT HISTORY FROM TRADITION

ALL the genealogical data have now been considered, synchronisms co-ordinating them have been established, and the resulting chronological scheme has been set out in the tables at pages 144-9 and 191-2. That is a skeleton, and an attempt may now be made to add thereto all the other particulars to be gathered from tradition, and to sketch in outline the course of history which all that information suggests. This is now offered here, based on what tradition actually says. It is impossible to avoid repeating a good deal of what has been narrated above in various connexions, but that has been reduced as much as possible, and this sketch should be read with the genealogical exposition in chapters VII to IX and with the discussions of synchronisms in chapters XII to XIV and elsewhere. The authorities for every statement are cited in the notes or by reference to preceding pages, and no statement is made without authority. In considering this outline we must put aside views formed from brahmanical literature, for to construct history from theological works and especially works with a strong priestly bias and lacking the historical sense is inadmissible (pp. 10, 14, 61). There is nothing in this account inconsistent with the Rigveda, as far as I am aware, if we do not read preconceived ideas into the Veda.

Tradition naturally begins with myth, and the myth that seeks to explain the earliest conditions in India derives all the dynasties that reigned there (not the populace) from a primaeva king Manu Vaivasvata, son of Vivasant (the sun), as briefly noticed above (p. 84). It is narrated in three forms, of which the second and third have more in common than the first. According to the first,<sup>1</sup> Manu had ten sons of whom the eldest was Ila, and Ila while on conquest entered Śiva's grove Saravana and became changed into a woman, Ilā, because Umā had laid a curse that any male creature which entered it should become female. Ilā consorted with Budha, son of Soma (p. 58), and Ila (sic) had by him a son Purūravas Aila. Then through Śiva's favour Ilā became a Kimpuruṣa named Sudyumna, a man one month and a woman another month. According to the second form,<sup>1</sup> Manu had nine sons and offered a sacrifice to Mitra and Varuṇa to obtain a son, but a daughter Ilā was born therefrom. She met Budha and bore Purūravas. Then she became a man named Sudyumna but through the same curse<sup>2</sup> was turned into a woman. Finally, through Śiva's favour she regained manhood as Sudyumna. The third form<sup>3</sup> agrees generally in this version, but places the transformation into manhood and back again into womanhood before she met Budha. Other books condense or combine these versions.<sup>4</sup>

Purūravas was thus fabled to be the son of Ilā or Ila by Budha,<sup>5</sup> and was well known as Aila.<sup>6</sup> Sudyumna had three sons,<sup>7</sup> two of whom were Utkala and Gaya, and the third is named Haritāsva<sup>8</sup> or Vinatāsva<sup>9</sup> or shortly Vinata.<sup>10</sup>

Manu had nine other sons (p. 84), and divided the earth, that is, India, into ten portions.<sup>11</sup> The distribution among the sons is not stated and some were excluded as Pr̥ṣadhra. Some Puranas imply that Sudyumna had a portion,<sup>12</sup> but others say he obtained none

<sup>4</sup> Lg i, 65, 17-31 combines the first and second forms. Kūr i, 20, 4-10 combines all three. Ag 272, 5-10 and Gar i, 138, 2-3 condense the story. Rām vii, 87 to 90 follows the first form but confusedly; and says Ila was king of Bālhi (87, 3; 90, 18) or Bālliuka (87, 7). MBh says (i, 75, 3140-4; 95, 3760) Manu's daughter was Ilā and her son was Purūravas, she being both his mother and his father. Cf. Br 226, 34.

because he had been a woman.<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless the authorities generally declare, first, that he received the town Pratiṣṭhāna<sup>2</sup> and gave it to Purūravas<sup>3</sup>; and secondly, that his three sons had territories of their own,<sup>4</sup> thus Utkala had the Utkala country,<sup>5</sup> Vinatāśva had a western country,<sup>6</sup> and Gaya had the city Gayā and the eastern region; but according to two Puranas,<sup>7</sup> Gaya had only the city Gayā, and Haritāśva had the eastern region together with the Kurus, that is, the Northern Kurus. These three principalities may be designated here collectively the 'Saudyumnas', a name which is sometimes given to them.<sup>8</sup>

Some Puranas say they were the Śakas.<sup>6</sup> If so, they lay outside India. The late Bhāgavata gives a list of his descendants, and says they developed into the Āgniveśyāyana brahmans;<sup>7</sup> but this, if true, more probably refers to Narīṣyanta, king of the Vaiśāla dynasty.<sup>8</sup> Prīṣadhra, it is said, became a śūdra, because he killed his guru's cow and was cursed<sup>9</sup>: and two Puranas say the guru was Cyavana.<sup>10</sup> Nābhāga<sup>11</sup> and his son Ambarīṣa (p. 98) probably reigned on the R. Jumna,<sup>12</sup> but their line played no part in traditional history. Nābhāneśīṣṭha's line reigned in the country of Vaiśālī (p. 96);<sup>13</sup> and Śāryāti, who

Ikṣvāku, the eldest and chief son, obtained Madhyadeśa,<sup>2</sup> and was the progenitor of the Solar race or dynasty,<sup>3</sup> with its capital at Ayodhyā. There are two versions of the development of his descendants. One found in six Puranas<sup>4</sup> says—Ikṣvāku had a hundred sons,<sup>5</sup> chief of whom were the eldest Vikukṣi, and Nimi and Dāṇḍa (or Dāṇḍaka): of those sons fifty, chief of whom was Śakuni, were kings in Uttarāpatha (N. India) and forty-eight others, chief of whom was Vaśāti, were rulers in Dakṣināpatha (the Dekhan).<sup>6</sup> Vikukṣi (also named Śāśāda) succeeded Ikṣvāku and reigned at Ayodhyā, and his successor was Kakutstha (p. 93). The other version is given by four Puranas<sup>7</sup> and runs thus:—Ikṣvāku had a hundred sons of whom the eldest was Vikukṣi<sup>8</sup> (and, as the Padma says, two others were Nimi and Dāṇḍaka). Vikukṣi had fifteen sons who were kings north of Meru, and the 114 others<sup>9</sup> were kings south of Meru. The eldest (of Vikukṣi's sons) was Kakutstha. The Bhāgavata (ix, 6, 4–5) gives a third version, but it is too late to be worthy of notice. The other Puranas give no such information.

From Ikṣvāku's son Nimi (or Nemi) sprang the dynasty that reigned in Videha.<sup>10</sup> He dwelt in a town famed as Jayanta (of which however nothing more seems to be known) and the capital

Some of the Puranas, as just mentioned, assign to Iksvāku a third son called Dāṇḍa or Dāṇḍaka, and it is said that after him was named the great Dāṇḍaka forest<sup>2</sup> which more or less covered the Dekhan. This seems to be an eponym to account for the name of the forest, because it clashes with the other statements about the many kings that occupied the Dekhan. However that may be, the noteworthy point is that the original sovereignty in that region was attributed to the same stock or race which was dominant in Ayodhyā and Videha.<sup>3</sup>

The kingdoms mentioned continued as they have been described, with the exception of the Aila dynasty at Pratiṣṭhāna. That quickly developed. Northward its expansion was limited by the kingdom of Ayodhyā and southward by the warlike Kārūṣas, hence its extension began north-westward and eastward along the Ganges. Purūravas was succeeded by Āyu at Pratiṣṭhāna, and another son Amāvasu founded another kingdom, the capital of which was then or afterwards Kānyakubja (Kanauj).<sup>4</sup> Āyu was succeeded by Nahuṣa,<sup>5</sup> and another son Kṣatravṛddha established himself at Kāśi (Benares).<sup>6</sup> Nahuṣa was a famous king.<sup>7</sup> His son and successor Yayāti was a renowned conqueror,<sup>8</sup> extended his kingdom widely, and was reckoned a samrāj.<sup>9</sup> He appears to have conquered not only all Madhyadeśa west of the Ayodhyā and Kānyakubja kingdoms, and north-west as far as the R. Sarasvatī,<sup>10</sup> but also the country west, south, and south-east of his territory of Pratiṣṭhāna.<sup>1</sup> He had five sons, Yadu, Turvasu, Druhyu, Anu and Pūru (p. 87). After a long reign<sup>2</sup> he divided his territories among them.<sup>3</sup> Pūru the youngest is said to have been the most dutiful<sup>4</sup> and Yayati installed him as his successor<sup>5</sup> in the ancestral sovereignty in the middle region, that is, in the southern half of the Ganges-Jumna doab with the capital Pratiṣṭhāna, and gave the elder sons the out-lying territories.<sup>6</sup> The texts collated show that Yadu got the south-west, Turvasu the south-east, Druhyu the west and Anu the north.<sup>7</sup> These directions are taken with reference to the ancestral kingdom that Pūru obtained; hence Yadu's realm lay in the country watered by the rivers Chambal (Carmanvatī), Betwa (Vetravatī) and Ken (Śuktimatī); Druhyu's kingdom in the country west of the Jumna and north of the Chambal; Anu's realm comprised the northern portion of the Ganges-Jumna plain; and Turvasu's kingdom the territory around Rewa, the Kārūṣas, who occupied it (ante) having been subdued, for nothing more is said

Hv 30, 1617-19 is similar, but misplaces Yadu in pūrvottarasatyām, which is impossible because there lay the Ayodhyā kingdom. Br 12, 19-20 is somewhat alike, but misplaces Yadu in pūrvasyām, which is impossible because Kāśi lay there. about Karūṣa until Vasu king of Cedi conquered it long afterwards (p. 118).<sup>1</sup>

At this time then the Aila race had dominated the whole of mid North India with the exception of the Ayodhyā kingdom, and had developed into seven kingdoms, those of Yayāti's five sons and the two earlier of Kānya-kubja and Kāśi. It had subjugated Madhyadeśa and made it emphatically Aila. The other kingdoms mentioned above continued, except that the Kārūṣas, and apparently the Nābhāgas, had been subdued. The Saudyumna stock remained unaffected. The Ayodhyā realm prospered,<sup>2</sup> and one of its early kings named Śrāvasta is said to have founded the city Śrāvastī.<sup>3</sup> The chief development occurred among Yadu's descendants, who increased and divided at once into two great branches, the Haihayas and Yādavas (p. 87). Subsequent occurrences show that the Yādava branch occupied the northern portion of Yadu's territory and the Haihayas the southern part.

There is some suggestion that the southern part of the Rajputana desert was still a very shallow sea<sup>4</sup> in those times, for in the story of the rishi Utāṅka Śrāvasta's second successor Kuvalāśva is said to have killed a Rākṣasa, Daitya or asura, Dhundhu (whence he got the name Dhundhumāra), near a sand-filled sea called Ujjälaka in the desert plains, which mean that desert.<sup>5</sup> Again, Viśvāmitra performed austerities and attained brahmanhood at Ruṣāṅgu's tīrtha on the R. Sarasvatī, in low lands near the sea (p. 205, note 2). The Sarasvatī would have flowed into that sea. Further, there

<sup>1</sup> MBh v, 148, 5046–52 says—Yadu was disobedient and dwelt in Nāgasāhvaya, so Yayāti cursed him and removed him to Gāndhāra: but this is wrong, because the Yādavas never were in Gāndhāra, and Nāgasāhvaya, i.e. Hastināpura, did not exist till built long afterwards, probably by Hastin. MBh i, 85, 3533, Mat 34, 30 (and Pad v, 12, 109 partially), give instead a wholly different account, thus:—

Yados tu Yādavā jātās Turvasor Yavanāḥ smṛtāḥ

is no mention (as far as I know) of any crossing the southern part of the desert even long afterwards.<sup>1</sup> If the sea did extend then over the southern part of that desert, that will throw some light on subsequent developments, and explain the fact that the southern part of the Indus region appears to have lain outside all early historical tradition.

The Yādava branch first developed a great kingdom under its king Śāśabindu, who was a famous cakravartin,<sup>2</sup> which means he extended his sway over neighbouring countries. The neighbouring countries were the Paurava realm on his east and the Druhyu territory on his north. He appears to have conquered the Pauravas, because there is a great gap in the Paurava genealogy from this point till Dusyanta restored the dynasty long afterwards,<sup>3</sup> which means that the dynasty underwent an eclipse. He also probably pressed on the Druhyus and forced them more into the Panjab, as will appear. He had many sons, who were known as the Śāśabindu or Śāśabindava princes;<sup>4</sup> hence it would seem that his territories were divided among them into many small principalities, for none of his successors were of great note.

The kingdom of Ayodhyā then rose to very great eminence under Yuvanāśva II<sup>5</sup> and especially his son Māndhātr.<sup>6</sup> The latter married Śāśabindu's daughter Bindumati (p. 150). He was a very famous king, a cakravartin and a samrāj, and extended his sway very widely<sup>7</sup> (pp. 39, 40). He must have overrun the Kānyakubja kingdom and the prostrate Paurava realm,<sup>1</sup> because, pushing beyond them westwards, he had a long contest with and conquered the Druhyu king, who appears to have been then on the confines of the Panjab;<sup>2</sup> so that the next Druhyu king Gāndhāra retired to the north-west and gave his name to the Gāndhāra country (p. 167). These indications suggest that he also pressed on the Ānavas, who lay almost between him and the Druhyus. There is no allusion that he assailed the Yādavas, nor probability, because the Śāśabindavas were his brothers-in-law. He appears to have been a great sacrificer and a hymn-maker.<sup>3</sup>

Māndhāṭ had three sons, Purukutsa, Ambarīṣa and Mucukunda.<sup>4</sup> Tradition suggests that Māndhāṭ or his sons carried their arms south to the river Narmadā.<sup>5</sup> Purukutsa's wife was named Narmadā;<sup>6</sup> and a fable says that the Nāgas induced him through the river's mediation to destroy the Mauneya Gandharvas, who had despoiled them.<sup>7</sup> Moreover Mucukunda, who was a famous king (p. 93), appears to be the Mucukunda whom the Harivaihśa describes in an erroneous setting. He built and fortified a town on the rocky bank of that river, at the foot of both the Vindhya and Rkṣa (Satpura) ranges, that is, at a place where the two ranges approach the river. It was Māhiṣmatī,<sup>8</sup> the modern Māndhāṭī on an island in the river.<sup>9</sup> He also built a spacious town named Purikā on the south bank near the Rkṣa range. They were his capitals. His kingdom did not survive long, as will appear.

The supremacy of Ayodhyā soon waned, and the Kānyakubja kingdom rose into local prominence under its king Jahnu;<sup>1</sup> and shortly afterwards, and perhaps in consequence of the disturbances caused by Māndhāṭī's conquests, three great movements occurred among the Haihayas, Ānavas and Druhyus.

The Haihayas prospered in their region of South Malwa, and one of their kings Sāhañja is said to have founded a city called Sāhañjanī,<sup>2</sup> and his son Mahiṣmant also the town Māhiṣmatī<sup>3</sup> mentioned above. Their successor Bhadraśrenya<sup>4</sup> carried his arms eastward, conquered the kingdom of Kāśi, took possession of Benares and reigned there, which means that he traversed the prostrate Paurava kingdom. The Kāśi king Divodāsa I recovered his territory and capital from Bhadraśrenya's sons, sparing one young son Durdama, but abandoned it afterwards<sup>5</sup> and built a new capital on the R. Gomatī at the eastern border of his land. The Rākṣasa Kṣemaka then took possession of Benares, and Durdama reconquered the kingdom. This occupation by Rākṣasas suggests that the country had been so devastated by war that rude tribes from the forests around occupied it; and in consonance with this it is said a conflict took place between Anaraṇya king of Ayodhyā, who reigned about this time, and a Rāvana,<sup>6</sup> who would be a king from the Dekhan.<sup>7</sup> The Haihayas held the Kāśi territory and seem to have been mainly engaged in raiding N. India.

<sup>1</sup> After him the Ganges which flowed through his territory was named Jāhnavi. But a fable is told to explain it, Vā 91, 54–8 : Bd iii, 66, 25–8 : Br 10, 15–19; 13, 83–6 : Hv 27, 1417–21; 32, 1757–61 : Viṣ iv, 7, 2–3 : Bhāg ix, 15, 3 : MBh xiii, 4, 202. Bd iii, 56, 44–8 an anachronism.

<sup>5</sup> This is explained as the consequence of a curse by Nikumbha in a fable about Śiva and Pārvatī in connexion with Benares: Vā 92, 24–61 : Bd iii, 67, 27–64 and Hv 29, 1542–82, 15491. Br 11, 41–3, 54 and Hv 32, 1737–9 relate the curse briefly.

<sup>6</sup> Rāvana killed him, so Bd iii, 63, 74; Lg i, 65, 44; Rām vi, 60, 8–10 and vii, 19 (amplified), both identifying him with the later Rāvana killed by Rāma. Reversely, Vā 88, 75.

The movements among the Ānavas and Druhyus seem to have been connected. The Ānavas (p. 108) rose to power about this time under two able kings, Mahāśāla and Mahāmanas, and the latter appears to have encroached on the east of the Panjab, because he is styled a cakravartin and lord of the seven dvīpas.<sup>1</sup> Under his two sons, Uśinara and Titikṣu, the Ānavas divided into two branches. One branch headed by Uśinara<sup>2</sup> established separate kingdoms on the eastern border of the Panjab (p. 109), namely, those of the Yaudheyas, Ambaṣṭhas, Navarāṣṭra and the city Kṝmilā; and his famous son Śivi Auśinara (pp. 39–41) originated the Śivis<sup>3</sup> in Śivapura and, extending his conquests westwards, founded through his four sons the kingdoms of the Vṛṣadarbhās, Mādras (or Madrakas), Kekayas (or Kaikeyas) and Suvīras (or Sauvīras), thus occupying the whole of the Panjab except the north-west corner. The Druhyus ruled in the Panjab at that time (ante), so that Śivi and his sons must have driven them back into that corner, which became known as Gāndhāra after the Druhyu king Gāndhāra. There the Druhyus maintained their position permanently, and it is said that five generations afterwards they began to multiply and in time founded many principalities in the mleccha countries in the northern region beyond India.<sup>4</sup> They would have formed the dominant ksatriya class there and have also carried their religion there.

The other branch of the Ānavas under Titikṣu moved eastward and, passing beyond Videha and the Vaiśāli country, descended into East Bihar among the ruder Saudyumna stock. There they founded a kingdom, which was called the kingdom in the east (p. 109), and which afterwards developed into Aṅga and four other kingdoms as will be explained.

About this time lived Kuśa, king of Kānyakubja, and his younger son Amūrtarayas<sup>5</sup> (or Amūrtarayas' son Gaya) is said to have carved out for himself a kingdom from another portion of the Saudyumna stock in the country known afterwards as Magadha:<sup>1</sup> and this was quite possible, for the only intervening territory was Kāśī, which had been ravaged by the Haihayas. Gaya reigned in the Gayā district and was a king of note (pp. 39, 40). Nothing more is said of this dynasty, except that it was overthrown afterwards.<sup>2</sup> The genealogies give Amūrtarayas a younger brother Vasu;<sup>3</sup> and it is said Vasu founded a kingdom at Girivraja,<sup>4</sup> but this is very doubtful, for he seems to be confused with Vasu Caidya who conquered Magadha afterwards (p. 118).

It was about this time apparently that the Śāryāta kingdom in Gujarat came to an end.<sup>5</sup> The capital Kuśasthalī was captured by Punyajana Rākṣasas, and the Śāryātas fled inland to other countries where they developed into bands of noble kṣatriyas; and Śāryātas are mentioned as forming one of the five groups of the Haihaya-Tālajaṅgas (p. 102). The Harivāṁśa adds that ultimately they became merged with hill tribes,<sup>6</sup> which would seem to mean that, after Sagara destroyed the Haihaya power, they became so merged.

The principal brahmans who dwelt in the lower region of the Narbadā were the Bhārgavas. They were ill-treated by the successors of the Haihaya king Kṛtavīrya and fled into Madhyadeśa. About that time or a little earlier was born the famous rishi Rācīka Aurva, who was chief among them.<sup>7</sup> Kṛtavīrya's son Arjuna<sup>8</sup> then propitiated Datta the Ātreya and was favoured by him (p. 229). He was a great monarch and conqueror (p. 41), and continuing the successes mentioned above, raised the Haihaya power to pre-eminence during a long reign. He captured Māhiṣmatī from the Karkotaka Nāgas<sup>1</sup> and made it his fortress-capital. He extended his conquests from the mouth of the Narbadā<sup>2</sup> as far as the Himalayas (p. 206). He defeated a Rāvāṇa, who is called king of Laṅka (in Ceylon) and had apparently come northward on conquest, and imprisoned him in Māhiṣmatī but released him afterwards.<sup>3</sup> The Bhārgavas were incensed against the Haihayas and sought to strengthen their position by alliances with kṣatriyas and the use of arms.<sup>4</sup> Thus Reikā Aurva married Satyavatī, daughter of Gādhi, king of Kānyakubja. Their son was Jamadagni, and Gādhi's son Viśvaratha became the brahman Viśvāmitra, and was succeeded by his son Aṣṭaka.<sup>5</sup> Jamadagni married a princess of Ayodhyā.

At that time the kingdom of Ayodhyā passed through a crisis. King Trayyāruṇa banished his only son Satyavrata Triśāṅku and handed the realm over to his priest Devarāj Vasiṣṭha, but after twelve years Viśvāmitra restored Satyavrata to the throne, overcoming Vasiṣṭha. Satyavrata was succeeded by his son Harīcandra; Rohita succeeded him and is said to have built a fortress-town Rohitapura.<sup>6</sup>

Arjuna had many sons.<sup>7</sup> Chief among them was Jayadhvaja who reigned in Avanti; and others were Śūra and Śūrasena,<sup>8</sup> who may have had territories of their own.<sup>9</sup> Jayadhvaja's son was Tālajaṅgha, and he had many sons, chief of whom was Vītihotra. At the end of his long reign Arjuna came into collision with Jamadagni and his son Rāma. The genealogical accounts do not explain how that happened, except as the result of Āpava's curse

<sup>9</sup> See p. 171. There is no clear mention of the Śūrasenas about this time except in Bd. iii, 49, 5-6, but that seems to be an anachronism, for it speaks of their capital Madhurā (Mathurā) also, which was not founded till afterwards, as will be narrated.

(p. 206). The simplest stories say that Arjuna or his sons raided Jamadagni's hermitage, ill-treated him and carried off his calf; Rāma in revenge killed Arjuna; Arjuna's sons killed Jamadagni; and Rāma declared war against them and slew many of them and of the Haihayas.<sup>1</sup> These stories are largely brahmanical,<sup>2</sup> and there is no ksatriya version,<sup>3</sup> yet some incidental allusions suggest that Rāma and the Bhārgavas were supported by the princes of Ayodhyā and Kānyakubja, who were allied to them by marriage<sup>4</sup> and who would naturally have opposed the dangerous raids of the Haihayas. Such a combination would explain how Rāma vanquished the Haihayas. Hostilities then ceased for a time.<sup>5</sup> The Haihayas received a set-back,<sup>6</sup> because it was not till later that they overcame Kānyakubja and Ayodhyā.

The Haihayas grew in power, and comprised five leading groups, the Vitihotras,<sup>7</sup> Sāryātas,<sup>8</sup> Bhojas,<sup>9</sup> Avantis and Tuṇḍikeras, all of whom were Tālajaighas (p. 102). Their dominion stretched from the Gulf of Cambay to the Ganges-Jumna doab and thence to Benares.<sup>10</sup> They continued their raids and there is no suggestion that they founded new kingdoms in the countries they overran. The Kānyakubja kingdom soon fell, for the dynasty ends with Aṣṭaka's son Lauhi. The kingdom of Ayodhyā was open to assault, and the Haihayas attacked it with the co-operation of Śakas,

<sup>3</sup> Bd iii, 47, 64-87 contains the nearest approach to a ksatriya account, and is noteworthy. It says nothing about the destruction of all ksatriyas.

<sup>4</sup> This would account for the remark in id. 74, that many years afterwards the Tālajaigha 'remembering the former hostility' attacked Ayodhyā and drove out Sagara's father. Pad vi, 268, 73-4 and 269, 158, though brahmanical, admit that Rāma acknowledged his kinship with the Ayodhyā princes and did not destroy them.

Yavanas, Kāmbojas, Pāradas and Pahlavas from the north-west,<sup>1</sup> and this fact shows that all the kingdoms between the north-west and Ayodhyā must have been overthrown. In fact, the long-continued Haihaya devastations left North India a tempting prey to the hardy races of that frontier. Bāhu<sup>2</sup> king of Ayodhyā was driven from his throne, took refuge in the forest and died near the hermitage of Aurva Bhārgava, whose personal name was Agni.<sup>3</sup> His queen gave birth to a son Sagara there and Aurva educated him.

The Haihaya conquests had thus reached to the kingdoms of Vaiśālī and Videha. The Vaiśālī realm was then under the rule of Karandhama, his son Avikṣit and his son Marutta, three noted kings (pp. 147, 157). It is said that Karandhama was besieged by a confederacy of kings and at length defeated them; that Avikṣit had a great conflict with the king of Vidiśā (Besnagar) and others and was captured, but Karandhama and his allies beat them and rescued him; and that Marutta had a contest with Nāgas.<sup>4</sup> There can be little doubt that those enemies were the Haihayas, for Vidiśā was in the Haihaya region, and that they were beaten off. There is no indication that the Haihayas conquered the Vaiśāla kings, and Marutta was a famous king and cakravartin.<sup>5</sup> The Haihaya conquests eastwards must have been stopped by some kingdom, and tradition suggests that it was these Vaiśāla kings who did that.<sup>6</sup>

branch. It is said<sup>1</sup> he placed his two youngest sons in Videha. This is improbable, for the Haihayas dominated all Madhyadeśa, and Videha is no doubt a mistake for Vidiśā.<sup>2</sup> His son Jyāmagha was expelled by his two elder brothers and sought his fortune southward in the hilly upper region of the Narbadā, at Mekalā,<sup>3</sup> Mṛttikāvatī<sup>4</sup> and in the Rkṣa hills (Satpura range), which country was wild and inhabited by Nāgas and other rude tribes. He established himself on the R. Śuktimatī (the Ken), in the hills near its source. There he led a predatory life. He or his son Vidarbha moved south and carved out a kingdom on the Tapti, and there Vidarbha reigned, the country being called Vidarbha (Berar), and the capital Vidarbha and Kundina.<sup>5</sup>

When Ayodhyā was conquered, the foreign tribes settled down in the country. They were kṣatriyas, had the ministrations of brahmans and observed brahmanic rites.<sup>6</sup> Hence the then Vasiṣṭha, Atharvanidhi I Āpava (p. 207), maintained his position as the great priest of Ayodhyā among them. So the kingdom remained for more than twenty years till Sagara attained manhood.

Meanwhile the Kāsi kings had been carrying on a long struggle from the eastern portion of their territory, which adjoined the Vaiśāli kingdom, against the Haihayas, and at length Pratardana, son of Divodāsa II, defeated the Vitahavyas (or Vitihotras, who were the chief Tālajaṅgha-Haihayas) and recovered his territory, though not Vārāṇasī itself, which was still occupied by Rākṣasas (pp. 153-5). He or his son Vatsa<sup>7</sup> carried the victory farther,

All these events may be summed up thus. Arjuna Kārtavīrya and the Haihayas maltreated the Bhārgavas and killed Jamadagni. When Sagara established his empire over North India, the only noticeable kingdoms that survived were the Videha, Vaiśalī and Ānava kingdoms in the east, Kāśi in Madhyadeśa, Turvasu's line in the hilly country of Rewa, the new kingdom of Vidarbha, and apparently the Yādava branch on the R. Chambal. After his death, the overthrown dynasties appear to have generally recovered themselves, and the Yādavas of Vidarbha seem to have extended their authority northward over the Haihaya territory. Vidarbha had three sons, one Bhīma Kratha succeeded him; Cidi, the son of another son Kaiśika, founded the dynasty of Caidya kings in Cedi,<sup>2</sup> the country lying along the south of the Jumna;<sup>3</sup> and the third Lomapāda founded a separate kingdom, the position of which is not defined (p. 103). Kaiśikas however still dwelt in Vidarbha with the Krathas.<sup>4</sup> The Ānava kingdom in the east, the nucleus of which was Aṅga, became divided up into five kingdoms, said to have been named after king Bali's sons (p. 158), Aṅga, Vaṅga, Kaliṅga, Pūndra and Suhma.<sup>5</sup> The capital of Aṅga was Mālinī, and its name was changed afterwards to Campā or Campāvati (Bhāgalpur) after king Campa.<sup>6</sup>

The Paurava claimant then was Duṣyanta, for the Paurava realm had been overthrown since Māndhāṭy's time, and Duṣyanta had been adopted as heir by Marutta of Turvasu's line, but after Sagara's death he re-established the Paurava dynasty (pp. 108, 156). territory however appears to have been shifted to the northern portion of the Ganges-Jumna doab, for Pratiṣṭhāna is no longer mentioned and its district was included in the Vatsa realm. Some passages make Hastināpura<sup>1</sup> the capital of Duṣyanta and Bharata,<sup>2</sup> and say Bharata's territory stretched from the R. Sarasvatī to the Ganges,<sup>3</sup> and that is no doubt right, because he was a great monarch with a wide sway (pp. 39-41); but their fifth successor Hastin is distinctly stated to have founded that city.<sup>4</sup> If those passages are right, Hastin may have enlarged it and given it his name. Bharata's successors were the Bharatas or Bhāratas (p. 113), and how his line was continued has been explained above (pp. 159-61).

Such seems to have remained the condition of India for some time. Ayodhyā rose to prominence again under Amūṣmant's second successor Bhagīratha,<sup>5</sup> and Bhagīratha's third successor Ambarīṣa Nabbāgi<sup>6</sup> (pp. 39-41). The Yādavas appear to have been divided up into a number of small kingdoms,<sup>7</sup> and at the western end of the Satpura hills was the small principality of Niṣadha, the king of which about this time was Nala.<sup>8</sup> Bharata's fifth successor Hastin made Hastināpura his capital (see above), and soon after Hastin's time Trīṇabindu's second successor Viśāla built Viśālā or Vaiśālī<sup>9</sup> as the capital of the kingdom which has been hitherto called the kingdom of Vaiśālī in anticipation.

Hastin had two sons, Ajamīḍha and Dvimiḍha, and under them the Paurava dynasty expanded and formed fresh kingdoms. A cousin of Hastin, Rantideva Sāṅkṛti, a famous king, who was also a Paurava, had a kingdom with capital Daśapura, that encroached into the Yādava territory and lay on the R. Chambal.<sup>1</sup> Dvimiḍha founded the dynasty of the Dvimiḍhas (pp. 111, 115) in a new realm which was apparently the modern district of Bareilly.<sup>2</sup> Ajamīḍha's realm was divided on his death among his three sons, the main kingdom with the capital Hastināpura, and the two others in the Krivi country (named Pañcāla afterwards<sup>3</sup>) which had evidently been conquered, namely, a northern called Ahicchattra, of which the capital was then or soon afterwards Ahicchatrā and Chatravatī, and a southern, of which the capitals were afterwards Kāmpilya and Mākandī (p. 113). These three dynasties were Pauravas, Bhāratas and Ājamīḍhas. Paurava was always applied to the main branch at Hastināpura. Ājamīḍha was never generally used, but in so far as it was used was also applied to that branch.<sup>4</sup> The use of Bhārata will be noticed.

About this time Kalmāṣapāda reigned at Ayodhyā, and the kingdom seems to have gone through trouble immediately afterwards, because the genealogies then give two lines of kings (pp. 93–4), which suggest that there was a division with two rival lines reigning for some six or seven kings, until Dilipa II Khaṭvāṅga re-established the single monarchy. It seems possible to connect this split with Kalmāṣapāda's conduct to Vasiṣṭha described above (pp. 208–9), for it can hardly be doubted that the brahmans of Ayodhyā would have been inflamed and have sought revenge. This would explain the statements that Sarvakarman in one line was brought up in secret, and that Mūlaka in the other fled to the forest for safety. There would have been a contest similar to that of Rāma Jāmadagnya's time described above, and the two contests would through the lack of the historical sense have been confused in brahmanic stories as shown (p. 152).

The main line at Hastināpura was undistinguished and played no noteworthy part at first, for the names of all its kings except Rkṣa have been forgotten till Sainvaraṇa's time (pp. 146, 148). The northern of the two other kingdoms first rose to eminence. One of its early kings, Bhṛmyaśva,<sup>1</sup> had five sons, to whom was given the nickname Pañcāla (p. 75),<sup>2</sup> and it seems they all received principalities because of that explanation and because one of the younger sons is called a king (p. 116). His territory then, which was not large, would have been divided into five small districts, and Mudgala and the other sons would have been quite petty rājās.<sup>3</sup> Mudgala's son and descendants became brahmans, the Maudgalyas (p. 251), but his grandson Vadhryaśva raised the kingdom, and Vadhryaśva's son Divodāsa augmented it (p. 120). They and their successors are the kings who play a prominent part in the Rigveda, and the other kings, who are named with them there, were probably the petty rājās in the lineage of Mudgala's brothers. All these kings of N. Pañcāla were kṣatriyan brahmans (chapter XXIII).

About Mudgala's time Ayodhyā rose to prominence under a famous king Dilipa II Khatvāṅga<sup>4</sup> and his immediate descendants Raghu, Aja and Daśaratha, and by this time the country had acquired the name Kosala.<sup>5</sup> Videha was flourishing, and there was a kingdom at Sāṅkāśyā, where Sīradhvaja Janaka killed its king and installed his brother Kuśadhvaja.<sup>6</sup> The Yādavas seem to have been divided into small kingdoms, but about this time the noted king Madhu must have consolidated them, if his territory extended from Gujarat to the Jumna as alleged,<sup>7</sup> and the Paurava kingdom which belonged to Rantideva (ante) had succumbed. His descendants were the Madhus or Mādhavas.<sup>1</sup>

In Daśaratha's time then the Yādavas had a powerful kingdom, the Pauravas had at least four states in the Ganges-Jumna plain, with North Pañcāla particularly prominent, and among the Pauravas there had been a great development of brahmanism as explained in chapter XXXIII. It is remarkable then in the Rāmāyaṇa, that Kosala's friendliest relations were with the eastern kingdoms of Videha, Aṅga and Magadha (sic), the Panjab kingdoms of Kekaya, Sindhu and Sauvīrā, the western kingdom of Surāṣṭra (sic),<sup>2</sup> and the Dākṣinātya kings, for these are specially named among the invitations sent out for Daśaratha's sacrifice; and no mention is made of any of the kings of the middle region of North India except Kāśi.<sup>3</sup> This remark holds good for the Rāmāyaṇa generally. Prayāga is described as in a great forest, opposite Śṛṅgaverapura the capital of a Niṣāda kingdom on the north side of the Ganges<sup>4</sup>—which is very improbable as the Vatsa kingdom comprised that region.

The story of Daśaratha's son Rāma<sup>5</sup> brings South India into view definitely for the first time. The Yādavas had established themselves in the north-west portion of the Dekhan, and all the rest of the Dekhan lay outside the scope of traditional history except in the above notices of the two Rāvaṇas, and was largely occupied by the great Dāṇḍaka forest. Yet the religion of North India had penetrated that region, for the story often speaks of munis there whom the Rākṣasas maltreated. There was a large colony of people who are called Rākṣasas in the lower Godāvāri valley called Janasthāna,<sup>1</sup> and it appertained to a flourishing kingdom of Rāksasas in Ceylon with their capital Laṅkā, which is described as situated on a hill in or jutting out into the southern ocean.<sup>2</sup> These so-called Rāksasas were not uncivilized, for Laṅkā is described in the most glowing terms,<sup>3</sup> and allowing for poetical exaggeration both therein and also to the contrary in personal descriptions,<sup>4</sup> it is obvious that their civilization was as high as that of North India.<sup>5</sup> These Rāksasas were evidently a sea-going people, as the connexion of their colony in Janasthāna with Laṅkā indicates. Their king was 'Rāvaṇa', called also Daśagrīva (and synonymously Daśasīrsa, Daśanana &c.). Rāvaṇa, a name given also to the two earlier kings above mentioned, was probably the royal title, the Tamil irāvazhi, 'king' (p. 242); and Daśagrīva or one of its synonymous forms was probably his personal Dravidian name Sanskritized, which accordingly gave rise to the fable that he had ten heads. The story of Rāma appears now largely as fable, but it is fairly clear that the fabulous in it is a perversion of simpler occurrences distorted gradually in accordance with later brahmanical ideas about Rāksasas and the marvellous, especially in the Rāmāyaṇa.

Through the intrigue of his step-mother Rāma was banished, with his wife Sītā and brother Lakṣmana, from Ayodhyā to spend fourteen years in the Dāṇḍaka forest.<sup>6</sup> He travelled south to Prayāga, then south-west to the region of Bhopal, then south across the Narbada, and then to a district where he dwelt ten years. That was probably the Chhattisgarh district, because that was called Dakṣīna Kosala, and in it was a hill called Rāmagiri. His long stay there would have connected it with his home, Kosala; hence probably arose its name.<sup>1</sup> Afterwards he went south to the middle Godāvari, where he came into conflict with the Rākṣasas colony of Janasthāna. It is said he avenged on the Rākṣasas their ill-treatment of munis. Rāvaṇa carried Sītā off to Laṅkā.<sup>2</sup> Rāma went south-west to Pampā lake and there met Sugrīva (with his counsellor Hanumant) who had been expelled by his brother Bālin, king of Kiṣkindhā.<sup>3</sup> They went south there, and Rāma killed Bālin and placed Sugrīva on the throne. These persons and the people of Kiṣkindhā are called monkeys, but they were a Dravidian tribe and were apparently akin to the Rākṣasas of Laṅkā, for Rāvaṇa and Sugrīva are spoken of as 'like brothers'.<sup>4</sup> With their aid Rāma proceeded south to what was afterwards Pāṇḍya, crossed over to Ceylon by Adam's Bridge, killed Rāvaṇa and recovered Sītā. Thus the only civilized communities in S. India mentioned at that time were in Janasthāna and at Kiṣkindhā. No others are alluded to, not even the Pāṇḍyas, through whose country Rāma passed. Hence Pāṇḍya had not then come into existence, nor therefore Cola or Kerala<sup>5</sup> (p. 108).

Rāma succeeded to the throne of Ayodhyā and was its last famous sovereign. His brothers obtained kingdoms elsewhere. Bharata's mother was a Kaikeya princess and he obtained that kingdom apparently.<sup>6</sup> His two sons Takṣa and Puṣkara are said to have conquered Gāndhāra and reigned there in Takṣaśilā and Puṣkarāvatī respectively.<sup>7</sup> Lakṣmaṇa had two sons, Āngada and Candraketu, and to them are assigned two countries near the Himalayas, with the capitals Āngadīyā and Candracakrā respectively, both in <sup>1</sup> Also later, the people of Eastern Kosala (i.e. Kosala) through fear of Jarāsanha migrated to the south, no doubt to this district, MBh ii, 13, 591-2; cf. 30, 1117. JRAS, 1908, p. 323. See eleventh note infra.

Kārapatha-deśa.<sup>1</sup> Śatruघna (marching probably round by Prayāga, for no mention is made of the Pañcālās,) attacked the Sātvata-Yādavas on the west of the Jumna, killed Mādhava Lavāna and built the capital Mathurā in the country thenceforward called Śurasena, and his two sons Subāhu and Śurasena reigned there (pp. 170-1).<sup>2</sup> Rāma<sup>3</sup> had two sons Kuśa and Lava.<sup>4</sup> Kuśa succeeded him and is said to have founded a town Kuśasthali on the Vindhya hills.<sup>5</sup> Lava obtained the northern portion of Kosala with the city Śrāvastī. Those collateral kingdoms seem to have disappeared soon. Bhīma Sātvata expelled Śatruघna's sons from Mathurā, and he and his descendants reigned there (p. 170). The two states in Gāndhāra receive no further notice and were probably absorbed among the Druhyus. Nothing more is said about the principalities of Lakṣmāna's sons nor about Lava's kingdom. Henceforth Ayodhyā plays no prominent part in traditional history, and the chief actors are the Pauravas and Yādavas.

The large Yādava kingdom appears to have been divided among Sātvata's four sons, Bhajamāna, Devāvṛdha, Andhaka and Vṛṣṇi.<sup>6</sup> Bhajamāna's kingdom is not specified, and his descendants attained no distinction. Devāvṛdha is connected with the R. Parṇāśā (the modern Banas in West Malwa), and he, his son Babhru and his descendants reigned at Mārttikāvata, which was apparently in the Śālva country<sup>7</sup> around Mt. Abu. Andhaka reigned at Mathurā,

This is not improbable, cf. the words, euhemerist, burke, boycott, bowlter. What they sang could not have been the present Rāmāyaṇa, which is a brahmanical production of much later date: see p. 202, note<sup>1</sup>.

the chief Yādava capital, as mentioned above. He had two sons, Kukura and Bhajamāna. Kukura and his descendants, the Kukuras, formed the main dynasty there down to Kaṁsa, while this Bhajamāna's descendants, who were specially known as the Andhakas, formed a princely line somewhere there, and Kṛtavarman was their king in the Pāñdavas' time.<sup>1</sup> Vṛṣni reigned probably at Dvārakā in Gujarat, because his descendant Akrūra reigned there.<sup>2</sup> Besides these there were Vidarbha, and other Yādava kingdoms in Avanti,<sup>3</sup> Daśārṇa<sup>4</sup>, &c., and probably a small Haihaya kingdom at Māhiṣmati.<sup>5</sup> The Bhojas were a family among the Haihayas (p. 102), and yet the name Bhoja is used widely of many Yādavas. Andhaka was the 'great Bhoja', and Devāvṛḍha's descendants were Bhojas (p. 105). Ugrasena and his son Kaṁsa were Bhojas,<sup>6</sup> and so was Kṛtavarman.<sup>7</sup> So also Bhīṣmaka and his son Rukmin of Vidarbha.<sup>8</sup> In fact the Bhojas were widespread,<sup>9</sup> and it would almost seem as if the name belonged to the Yādavas generally, except perhaps the Vṛṣnis in Gujarat.<sup>10</sup>

About this time there reigned in North Pañcāla Srñjaya, his son Cyavana-Pijavana and his son Sudāsa-Somadatta, the Vedic Sudās (p. 120). Cyavana was a great warrior, and Sudās extended his territory.<sup>11</sup> They raised the dynasty to its height. They seem to have conquered both the Dvīmīḍha dynasty and South Pañcāla, for there is admittedly a gap in the former genealogy (p. 115) which appears to occur at this time, and the reference to king Nīpa and his sons in the latter implies the same apparently at this time, just as a similar remark about Somaka afterwards<sup>12</sup> certainly covers a long gap. Sudās drove the Paurava king Saṁvarāṇa of Hastināpura out, defeating him on the Jumna. His conquests stirred up a confederacy of the neighbouring kings to resist him—Pūru (Saṁvarāṇa), the Yādva (the Yādava king of Mathurā), the Śivas (Śivis, who were Ānavas, p. 109), Druhyus (of Gāndhāra, ante), Matsyas (west of Śūrasena), Turvaśa (the Turvasu prince, apparently in Rewa) and other smaller states.<sup>1</sup> Sudās defeated them in a great battle near the R. Paruṣṇī (Ravi), and Pūru, Saṁvarāṇa, took refuge in a fortress near the R. Sindhu (Indus) many years. Sudās was succeeded by his son Sahadeva and grandson Somaka, and the kingdom declined.<sup>2</sup> Saṁvarāṇa recovered his kingdom of Hastināpura with 'Vasiṣṭha's' aid (p. 210) probably from Somaka,<sup>3</sup> and so conquered North Pañcāla. His son Kuru raised the Paurava realm to eminence and extended his sway beyond Prayāga, which means that he subdued South Pañcāla which intervened. He gave his name to Kurukṣetra and to Kurujāṅgala, which adjoined it on the east and in which Hastināpura lay (p. 76).<sup>4</sup> His successors were called the Kurus or Kauravas, a name that was extended also to the people.<sup>5</sup>

Kuru's grandson Janamejaya II lost the throne, which then passed to a younger branch (p. 114), and the kingdom appears to have declined. North Pañcāla had sunk into insignificance, but the Dvimidha dynasty revived, and also South Pañcāla under the Nīpas in their capital Kāmpilya. Soon afterwards Vasu, a descendant of Kuru, conquered the Yādava kingdom of Cedi and established himself there, whence he was known as Caidya-ūparicara (p. 118). His capital was Śuktimatī on the R. Śuktimatī (the Ken).<sup>6</sup> He extended his conquests eastwards as far as Magadha and apparently north-west also over Matsya which existed before as just mentioned; hence he was reckoned a samrāj and cakravartin.<sup>7</sup> He divided his territories among his five sons, consisting of Magadha, Cedi, Kauśāmbī, Karuṣa and apparently Matsya. His eldest son Brhadratha took Magadha, with Girivraja as his capital,<sup>1</sup> and founded the famous Bāhradratha dynasty there; and with it Magadha for the first time took a prominent place in traditional history.

Later, the Kauravas again became eminent under Pratīpa<sup>2</sup> and his successor Śantanu, who superseded his elder brother or cousin Devāpi (p. 252); and South Pañcāla under Brahmadatta (p. 164). Ugrāyudha of the Dvimidhas conquered North Pañcāla and destroyed the dynasty in South Pañcāla. He then attacked the Kauravas after Śantanu's death, but Bhīṣma killed him, and Prṣata, the heir to North Pañcāla, who had taken refuge in Kāmpilya, recovered his ancestral kingdom (p. 166). S. Pañcāla with its dynasty destroyed would seem to have been under the sway of the Kauravas.

Jarāsandha, king of Magadha, then rose to the highest power,<sup>3</sup> and extended his supremacy around,<sup>4</sup> and as far as Mathurā, where Kaṁsa, the Yādava king, who had married two of his daughters, acknowledged him as overlord. Kaṁsa relying on his favour tyrannized over his own subjects, and Kṛṣṇa killed him. This roused Jarāsandha's wrath against Kṛṣṇa and the Bhojas of Mathurā. For a time they resisted him,<sup>5</sup> but feeling their position there insecure migrated in a body to Gujarat and established themselves in Dvārakā,<sup>6</sup> where Kṛṣṇa ultimately obtained the leadership.<sup>7</sup>

Śantanu's grandsons were Dhṛtarāṣṭra and Pāṇḍu. Dhṛtarāṣṭra had many sons Duryodhana, &c., who as the elder branch were called the Kauravas. Pāṇḍu had five sons, Yudhiṣṭhira, Bhīma, Arjuna, Nakula and Sahadeva, who were known as the Pāṇḍavas. Pāṇḍu died early, and there was intense jealousy between the cousins.

Pṛṣata was succeeded by his son Drupada in North Pañcāla, but Drona, whom Drupada treated with disdain, conquered him with the aid of the young Pāṇḍavas and Kauravas. Drona got both North and South Pañcāla, and keeping North Pañcāla for himself gave Drupada South Pañcāla. With Drupada in that transfer went the Śrījayas and Somakas, for they accompanied him at the Bhārata battle.<sup>1</sup>

The young Pāṇḍavas then contended with Duryodhana and the other sons of Dhṛitarāṣṭra for their share of the Kaurava territory and received the small principality of Indraprastha (Delhi). Being ambitious they had to reckon with Jarāsandha, and Bhīma and Arjuna with Kṛiṣṇa's help killed him, their common enemy.<sup>2</sup> They were banished for fourteen years, as the penalty of losing at dice, and at the end of that time re-claimed their principality, but Duryodhana refused all terms, and they appealed to arms. They were aided by the Matsyas, Cedis, Kārūṣas, Kāśis, South Pañcālas, Western Māgadhas and the Western Yādavas from Gujarat and Surāṣṭra; and on Duryodhana's side were all the Panjab nations, and all the other kingdoms of Northern India and the north of the Dekhan. The contest began rather as an armed demonstration,<sup>3</sup> but soon developed into deadly earnest, and ended in the victory of the Pāṇḍavas, with the slaughter of nearly all the kings and princes who took part in it.<sup>4</sup> It was the famous Bhārata battle. Yudhiṣṭhīra became king of the Kurus<sup>5</sup> and reigned at Hastināpura.

Much stress has been laid on the fact, that the Brāhmaṇas and Sūtras make no reference to the Pāṇḍavas and the Bhārata battle,<sup>6</sup> as throwing doubt on the alleged events, but the explanation is simple. That battle was a purely political contest, had no religious significance, and (though described at great length in the epic) was a brief struggle between the Pāṇḍavas and Dhārtarāṣṭras. All that it decided was which of them should hold the Kuru realm. Hence it did not concern the recluse brahmans who composed the religious literature, and naturally they did not mention it. Moreover, the name Pāṇḍava was a transient one. The sons of Dhṛitarāṣṭra and of Pāṇḍu were cousins, all Kurus or Kauravas, and the patronymic Pāṇḍava was needed as distinctive only during their struggle, for the Pāṇḍavas when they conquered succeeded as Kurus to the Kuru realm, their cousins were all killed, and the name Pāṇḍava had no longer any raison d'être. Consequently it appears far less often in the last seven books than in the earlier books of the epic, and naturally finds no place in the religious literature which was composed after the kingdom was settled in Yudhiṣṭhīra's successors.<sup>1</sup> This matter is a signal illustration of the difference between kṣatriya and brahmanic thought (p. 59), and of the futility of expecting purely secular history in the priestly books. Politically and for kṣatriyas that contest and its results were a very great event; religiously and for brahmans (especially recluse brahmans) it had no importance whatever.

Dhṛitarāṣṭra after some years longer retired to the forest<sup>2</sup> and was consumed in a conflagration.<sup>3</sup> The accounts of what happened subsequently, so far as tradition discloses events, are chiefly in the early and closing chapters of the Mahābhārata<sup>4</sup> and the prophetic sketches of 'future kings' in the Puranas.<sup>5</sup> Some years after the battle<sup>6</sup> the Yādavas of Gujarat were ruined by fratricidal strife and Kṛṣṇa died. Under Arjuna's leadership they abandoned Dvārakā (on which the sea encroached) and Gujarat and retreated northwards, but were attacked and broken up by the rude Ābhīras of Rajputana. Arjuna established Hārdikya's son at Mārttikāvata, Yuyudhāna's grandson on the R. Sarasvatī, and bringing the bulk of the people to Indraprastha (Delhi) placed Vajra, the surviving Vṛṣṇi prince, as king over them.<sup>7</sup> Yudhiṣṭhīra and his brothers then abdicated and placed Arjuna's grandson Parīkṣit II on the throne.<sup>8</sup>

The great slaughter of kṣatriyas in the battle must have seriously weakened the stability of the kingdoms, especially in the north-west, which was faced by hostile frontier tribes. Consequently it is not surprising that the accounts indicate disorganization. Nāgas established themselves at Takṣaśilā and assailed Hastināpura—which indicates that the Panjab kingdoms that played so prominent a part in the battle had fallen, and certainly little more is heard of them.<sup>1</sup> The Nāgas killed Parikṣit II, but his son Janamejaya III defeated them and peace was made. Still they held the north-west, the principalities on the Sarasvatī and at Indraprastha disappeared, and Hastināpura remained the outpost of the Hindu kingdoms of North India.<sup>2</sup>

So affairs remained for a time, but Janamejaya's fourth successor abandoned Hastināpura and made Kauśāmbī his capital, because (it is said) Hastināpura was carried away by the Ganges. The explanation is inadequate, because, if that were the whole truth, he could have chosen some other town near by as a new capital, and there was no necessity to move more than 300 miles south across South Pañcāla to Kauśāmbī. Manifestly he was obliged to abandon all the northern part of the Ganges-Jumna doab, and there can be no doubt that he was driven south by pressure from the Panjab. This retreat mixed up the Kurus of Hastināpura with the South Pañcālas, and led to the combination of the Kurus and Pañcālas (including the Srñjayas), that is, the blended Kuru-Pañcālas,<sup>3</sup> a fusion which may be reckoned, according to the dates estimated in p. 182 (for this king was Adhisīrmaṅga's son), at about 820 B.C. The Kaurava-Pauravas thus reigned at Kauśāmbī which was in the Vatsa country, and one of the latest kings was Udayana, who was a king of note.<sup>4</sup>

No further changes are alluded to for a long time. A list is given of the noteworthy kingdoms that continued to exist (p. 180), viz. states in the eastern part of North India, Ayodhyā, Kāśī, the Maithilas (of Videha), Bārhadrathas (of Magadha, which probably included Aṅga), and Kalinga; the middle states of the Vithotras, Haihayas and Aśmakas; and those that bounded these along their west side, North Pañcāla, the Kurus (the combined Kuru-Pañcālas), Sūrasena and Avanti. The omission from the list of all the countries further west and north-west is significant, and suggests that great changes had occurred there. This is corroborated by allusions to the Panjab nations in the Mahābhārata, which show a steady deterioration in brahmanic estimation from the time of the battle when their princes ranked equally with those of Madhyadeśa, until at length those nations are pronounced to be wicked and mlecchas<sup>1</sup> and are unsparingly reprobated.<sup>2</sup>

The first change recorded occurred in Magadha, where the Bārhadrathas were supplanted by the Pradyotas, and these afterwards by the Śiśunāgas. Next, it is said, Mahāpadma Nanda destroyed all those kingdoms and brought all their territories under his sole sway.<sup>3</sup>

Here this attempted outline may close, for the Śiśunāgas and the subsequent history are dealt with in V. A. Smith's Early History of India, but something may be added with regard to the chronology down to Candragupta.

The calculations made in pages 179-82 yielded these approximate dates as regards Magadha—Senājit began to reign about 850 B.C.; he and his 15 successors, and the 5 Pradyotas and the 10 Śiśunāgas reigned altogether 448 years (the average reign being thus about 14½ years); Mahāpadma then began in 402; he and his eight sons reigned 80 years; and Candragupta ascended the throne in 322 B.C. According to that average the 5 Pradyotas with 72 years would have begun in 619 B.C., and the 10 Śiśunāgas with 145 years in 547 B.C.; but the synchronisms of Buddha, Bimbisāra and Ajātaśatru (the fifth and sixth Śiśunāgas)<sup>4</sup> show that Ajātaśatru had come to the throne before Buddha's death about 487 B.C., and that the beginning of the Śiśunāgas should be placed earlier than 547 though not necessarily as early as 602 B.C. The above average makes the combined duration of the Pradyotas and Śiśunāgas (72 + 145) 217 years; and it is noteworthy that the Matsya gives the Pradyotas 52 years and can be read as assigning the Śiśunāgas 163 years, that is, 215 years altogether. This remarkable agreement suggests that the only modification needed in the above calculations is to transfer 20 years from the Pradyotas to the Śiśunāgas, whereby the chronology may be arranged thus:—

Accession of Senājit Bārhadratha	b.c. 850.
He and 15 Bārhadratha kings (average, $14\frac{1}{2}$ years)	231 years.
Beginning of the Pradyotas	b.c. 619.
5 Pradyotas (average, $10\frac{1}{2}$ years)	52 years.
Beginning of the Śiśunāgas	b.c. 567.
10 Śiśunāgas (average, $16\frac{1}{2}$ years)	165 years.
Accession of Mahāpadma Nanda	b.c. 402.
He and his eight sons	80 years.
Accession of Candragupta	b.c. 322

These figures will I think be found to fit in with all the chronological particulars<sup>1</sup>; yet, if any further adjustment is needed, we might quite fairly shorten the Bārhadratha period by a few years ( $\frac{1}{2}$  year per reign), and date the beginning of the Pradyotas about 627 b.c. and that of the Śiśunāgas about 575 b.c., or both even 5 years earlier.

CHAPTER XXV

INFERENCES SUGGESTED BY TRADITIONAL HISTORY

WHAT the foregoing account based on tradition suggests may now be considered as regards the origins of the dynasties, Aryan and non-Aryan peoples and tribes, the Aryan occupation of India and how the Aryans entered India. Here also one must put away all preconceived ideas and see what tradition indicates.

The whole of the myth regarding origins has been set out (pp. 253 f.). In it there is no connexion between Manu's nine sons and Purūravas Aila and Sudyūmna except through Ilā with her fabulous changes of form. It seems probable that three different myths have been blended together in an attempt to unify the origins of three different dominant races, said to have been derived from Manu, Purūravas and Sudyumna, and apparently constituting three separate stocks.

Tradition thus alleged that at the earliest time all the kings and chiefs throughout India, with two exceptions, belonged to one common stock descended from Manu; and it says so doubly, because it declares, first, with regard to his sons that he divided the earth (that is, India) among them, and secondly, with regard to the offspring of his son Ikṣvāku that they were kings throughout the whole of India<sup>1</sup> according to both the versions given (p. 257). It also says that of that common stock four kingdoms were pre-eminent, namely, the Aikṣvākus at Ayodhyā, the Janakas in Videha, another (afterwards called the Vaiśalakas) in the country immediately north of Patna, and the Śāryātas at Kuśasthalī in Ānarta; with apparently three less prominent, the Kāruṣas in the country around Rewa, a kingdom at Mahiṣmatī on the R. Narbada, and another on the R. Payoṣṇī (p. 257, note 6); with perhaps an eighth, the Dhārṣṭakas in the Panjab (p. 256), and possibly a ninth, Nābhāga's line, on the Jumna (p. 256). Those two exceptions were first, Purūravas Aila at Pratiṣṭhāna, and secondly, the Saudyumnas, who occupied the town Gayā, the country eastward of a line drawn roughly from Gayā to Cuttack, and the region north of the Ganges eastward of Videha and the Vaiśalaka kingdom.

According to tradition then Purūravas Aila and his lineage at Pratiṣṭhāna formed one stock, the chieftains of Gayā and eastern India formed a second stock, and all the kings and chiefs of the rest of India belonged to a third stock with their principal dominion in Oudh and North Bihar. The first is the well-known Aila or Aīḍa<sup>2</sup> race, often called the 'Lunar race' because myth derived it from Soma, 'the moon'. The second may be distinguished as the Saudyumna race,<sup>3</sup> as already mentioned (p. 255), but it never played any noteworthy part. The third has no definite common name in tradition, yet being derived from the sons of Manu, son of

Vivasvant, 'the sun,' it might be designated the Mānava and 'Solar' race. The term Mānava is used sometimes to denote particularly Manu's immediate descendants,<sup>1</sup> and so is applied in the myth to Sudyumna.<sup>2</sup> It is also extended to distant descendants more as a racial term than as a patronymic,<sup>3</sup> and is used as a definite racial term in distinction from Aila.<sup>4</sup> But Mānava commonly meant simply 'man', and became hardly characteristic. The title 'Solar' is generally restricted to the Aikṣvāku<sup>5</sup> dynasty of Ayodhyā, and so cannot well be applied to the whole stock. A general term is however needed, and this stock may be described and distinguished by the name Mānva,<sup>6</sup> which is equivalent to Mānava, but not being found in Sanskrit is a neutral term.

According to these traditions royal power first developed mainly in the Gangetic plain, in the towns Ayodhyā, Mithilā, Pratiṣṭhāna and Gayā, with an off-lying branch at Kuśasthalī on the western sea-coast, and apparently two others on the rivers Narbadā and Tapti. The Mānva city Ayodhyā is made the most ancient,<sup>7</sup> and these allegations imply that civilization was as far advanced (or perhaps more so) among the Mānvās as among the Ailas, when the latter entered India.

These traditions deal only with the ruling classes, the kings, chiefs and kṣatriyas, and not with brahmans nor the people generally. It is nowhere declared (as far as I am aware) that brahmans, vaiśyas and śūdras generally were Manu's offspring.<sup>1</sup> The brahmans expressly claimed other origin (chap. XVI). Nothing is said about the real origin of the vaiśyas, śūdras and populace generally. The brahmanical figment that the four castes were produced from different parts of Brahmā's body in no wise asserts any common origin. There are, however, abundant indications that India contained many folk of rude culture or aboriginal stock, such as Niśādas,<sup>2</sup> Dāsas and Pulindas. Powerful races of hostile character are often mentioned, such as Dānavas, Daityas, Rākṣasas, Nāgas and Dasyus. Some of these were partially civilized, while others were rude and savage and were sometimes cannibals. Those races were reduced to subjection and their barbarous practices were repressed; and, as they came under the influence of Aryan civilization, those names became opprobrious, until at length they ceased to possess any ethnological force and turned into purely evil appellations, just like the word asura, and all became synonymous with the meaning 'demon'.<sup>3</sup> This process has gone on continuously;<sup>4</sup> thus, Piśāca was originally the name of a tribe<sup>5</sup> and ultimately turned to mean an impish goblin. The following are instances.

These names, Dānava, Daitya, &c., denoted peoples originally.<sup>6</sup> Thus king Yayāti married Śarmiṣṭhā, daughter of Vṛṣaparvan (p. 87) who was king of the Dānavas and a Daitya.<sup>7</sup> The Śālvās were a people of note, who occupied the country around Mt. Ābu,<sup>8</sup> and they are called Dānavas and Daiteyas.<sup>9</sup> Bhīma killed the Rākṣasa chief Hidimba, and had by his sister Hidimbā a son

Similarly the Rākṣasas in the story of Rāma were the inhabitants of Ceylon and the Godāvarī valley (p. 277).<sup>8</sup>

As these peoples were generally enemies, these names turned to mean alien and hated, hostile or savage, men.<sup>9</sup> So Kṛṣṇa's son Aniruddha married the daughter of Bāṇa, who is called king of the Daityas.<sup>10</sup> These names next became terms of hatred, opprobrium and abuse. Thus the adherents of Kāṁsa, king of the Yādavas at Mathurā, are called Dānavas;<sup>11</sup> and Madhu, the great king of the Yādavas, Kṛṣṇa's ancestor, from whom he obtained the patronymic Mādhava, is styled a Daitya and king of the Dānavas, although his descent from Yayāti and Yadu is acknowledged (p. 66). This abusive use led to the attribution of evil characteristics to such people, who were then described as demonic beings, and so these terms approximated to asura in meaning.<sup>12</sup> Thus Madhu's descendant, Lavaṇa Mādhava, is called Dānava, Rākṣasa and asura (p. 170); Jarāsandha, the great king of Magadha, who was a Bhārata, is stigmatized as an asura;<sup>13</sup> and the Buddhists and Jains are treated as asuras and Daityas.<sup>14</sup>

<sup>14</sup> P. 68. Br 160 seems to give similar expression to the contest between brahmanism and Dravidian religion in the south.

Finally, in the latest stories and versions of stories all these names and asura became virtually synonymous and meant 'demons';<sup>1</sup> and are so used, as in the story of Kuvalayāśva,<sup>2</sup> and in the fables of devāsura wars.<sup>3</sup> These changes in the application of these terms give some help towards discriminating tales and allusions as old or as late, while we remember, however, that older stories underwent modifications later, as pointed out (p. 74).

By far the greater part of ancient historical tradition deals with the doings of the Aila stock, its growth and expansion. Quite different were the fortunes of the Mānva stock. It occupied the greatest part of India originally, but steadily lost ground before the Ailas. At two epochs it is said to have risen in the Ayodhyā realm to paramount dominion, first, in Māndhāṭr's conquests, and again when Sagara overthrew the Haihayas and foreign tribes, but the supremacy was short-lived, and the Ailas renewed their progress. After Sagara's time the three Mānva kingdoms of Ayodhyā, Videha and Vaiśālī played almost entirely a conservative part, influencing little the political development of India, which thence-forward was worked out by the two Aila branches, the Pauravas and Yādavas. The expansion of these two and the other branches has been explained in the last chapter. We may now take stock of the racial and political changes that had taken place, down to the time of the Bhārata battle.

Of the Mānva kingdoms, that existed originally, three remained, those of Ayodhyā, Videha and Vaiśālī; and all the Dekhan except the NW. part remained unchanged, though it is said that the ruling families in Pāṇḍya, Cola and Kerala were offshoots from the Turvasu branch of the Ailas (p. 108).

The Saudyumnas had been almost overwhelmed by the Ānavas and Pauravas, and were restricted to the Utkalas and other clans which occupied the hilly tracts from Gayā to Orissa. All North and East Bengal was held by the Prāgjyotiṣa kingdom, which is nowhere connected with any of these races and would seem to have been founded by an invasion of Mongolians from the north-east, though tradition is silent about this outlying development. The configuration of the five Ānava kingdoms in the east, the Aṅgas,

Vāṅgas, Pundras, Suhmas and Kaliṅgas, which held all the sea-coast from Ganjam to the Ganges delta, and formed a long compact curved wedge with its base on the sea-coast and its point above Bhāgalpur, suggests that there had also been an invasion from the sea, that penetrated up the Ganges valley, leaving the hilly tracts on its west and east alone;<sup>1</sup> and this conjecture, if reasonable, would mean that the invaders had driven the Saudyumna stock into those hilly tracts, and that that had taken place before those five kingdoms were formed. But there is no trace in tradition of any such invasion of this distant region.

All the rest of North India and the north-west part of the Dekhan had been dominated by the Aila stock and was held thus:—

The Pauravas ruled the whole of the Ganges and Jumna plain from the Siwalik hills to Magadha, except Śūrasenā (which was Yādava) and Kāśi, namely, the kingdoms of Hastināpura, Pañcāla, Cedi, Vatsa, Karuṣa and Magadha (in all of which the ruling families were Bhāratas), and possibly Matsya. Kāśi was an Aila kingdom of earlier foundation (p. 258).

The Yādavas held all the country between the Rajputana desert and a line drawn roughly from Bombay to SE. Berar and then north to the Jumna, excluding petty chieftainships in the hills and probably Matsya.

The Ānavas held (1) all the Panjab (except the NW. corner), comprising the kingdoms of Sindhu, Sauvīra, Kaikeya, Madra, Vāhlika, Sivi and Ambaṣṭha; and (2) all East Bihar, Bengal proper (except the north and east) and Orissa, comprising the kingdoms of Aṅga, Vāṅga, Pundra, Suhma and Kalinga.

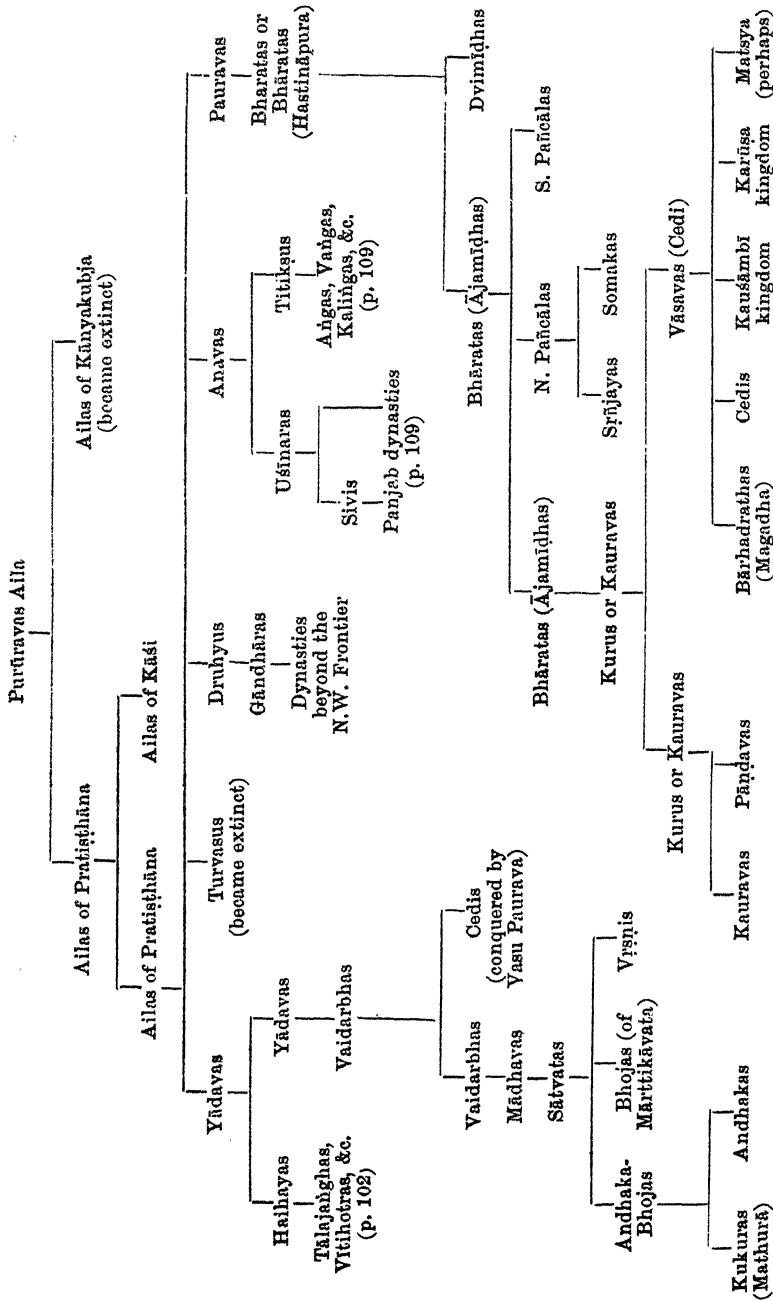

The Druhyus held the Gāndhāra kingdom and the NW. frontier, and are said to have spread out beyond that and established kingdoms in the mleccha countries outside in early times.

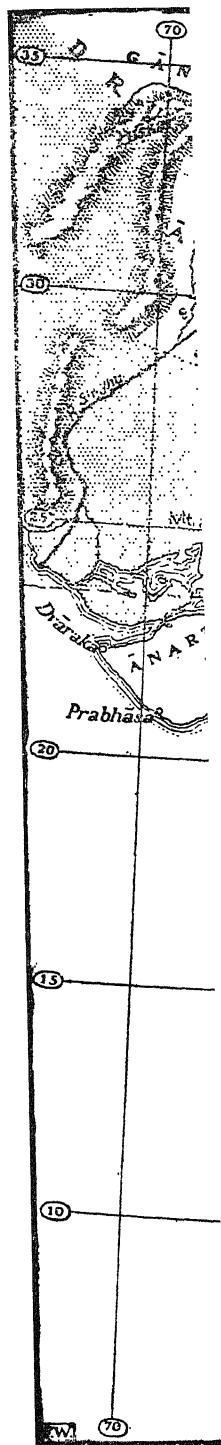

The Turvasu line had disappeared, except that the Pāṇḍya, Cola and Kerala dynasties claimed descent from it.

These results are exhibited in the annexed table and map.<sup>2</sup> They do not mean that the Aila stock constituted the bulk of the population, but that it had conquered those lands and was the dominant body in them. It supplied the kṣatriya class, which would have influenced the bulk of the people profoundly, so that the higher classes were no doubt largely leavened with Aila blood, though the lower grades would have remained racially the same, namely, the various groups of pre-existing folk.

The broad result stands out clear that the Aila stock, which began in a small principality at Allahabad, had dominated the whole of North India and down to Vidarbha, with the exception of the three Mānva kingdoms of Ayodhyā, Videha and Vaiśāli ; and these had been influenced by the Ailas. So it is said, the earth was dominated by the five races (vāṁśa) descended from Yayāti.<sup>1</sup> This result agrees exactly with the Aryan occupation of India, so that what we call the Aryan race is what Indian tradition calls the Aila race, and so Aila = Aryan. The Saund-yumna stock would no doubt be the Mundā race and its branch the Mōn-Khmēr folk in the east ;<sup>2</sup> and in the intervening region it would have been subjugated by the Ānava occupation, and also by a prior invasion of Bengal by new-comers from the sea if the above surmise of such an invasion be true. The Mānva stock, which held all the rest of India including the above three kingdoms, seems naturally to declare itself Dravidian.<sup>3</sup> These conclusions are not put forward anywhere in the genealogies or Puranas. True, it is said that the earth was dominated by the five races<sup>4</sup> descended from Yayāti, but the ethnical significance of this statement is nowhere noticed, and no precedence is accorded to those

<sup>3</sup> The fact that many of the names of the early kings of the Mānva stock have a Sanskrit appearance does not necessarily militate against this, because they would have naturally been Sanskritized in the course of time. Daityas, Dānavas and Rākṣasas also have Sanskritic names. Later kings no doubt adopted Aryan names.

<sup>4</sup> The term 'the five peoples' often used in Rigv and other Vedic literature has received three explanations ; (1) the five tribes descended from Yayāti ; (2) the five families of the Pañcālas ; and (3) all people : Vedic Index i, p. 466. This last is possible, for in the present day 'five' is used to convey general comprehensiveness, thus pāñc jan often means 'everybody'. It is hardly necessary that the term should have the same meaning everywhere, and it may be suggested that all three are possible. It may have the first meaning in Rigv i, 7, 9 ; vi, 14, 4 ; 46, 7 ; ix, 65, 23 and x, 45, 6, for these hymns are attributed to rishis who lived before the Pañcālas existed. It may have the second meaning in iii, 53, 16 and iv, 38, 10 ; and possibly in viii, 9, 2 ; 32, 22 and x, 60, 4 ; but not probably in i, 176, 3 or ix, 92, 3. As regards other passages in Rigv there appear to be no chronological indications.

Aila families, for in the genealogical accounts the post of honour in being described first is always given to the Solar or Mānva race. The unintentional way in which these conclusions present themselves from those accounts lends strong support to their truth, and those who maintain other views about the Aryan occupation of India must explain how such accounts arose, possessing no ethnical bias and yet enshrining real ethnical facts.

Moreover, these conclusions are entirely supported by the evidence of language, as set out by Sir G. Grierson.<sup>1</sup>

According to tradition in chapter XXIV the Ailas or Aryans began at Allahabad, conquered and spread out north-west, west and south, and had by Yayāti's time occupied precisely the region famed as Madhyadesa. They possessed that Mid-land definitely and made it their own thoroughly, so that it was 'their true pure home', as Sir G. Grierson describes it linguistically.<sup>2</sup> They expanded afterwards into the Panjab and East Afghanistan, into West India and the north-west Dekhan, into East and South Bihar and into Bengal—precisely as he finds the Aryans did linguistically in those very regions, which he calls the 'Outer Band'.<sup>3</sup> Also it has been pointed out that the Ayodhyā realm was non-Aila, was not subdued by the Ailas and was only influenced by them. This agrees exactly with his linguistic inference, that in Oudh 'there is a mixture [of language] of the same nature, although here the Midland language has not established itself so firmly as it has in the west and south'.<sup>4</sup>

Thus the political account as tradition reveals it accords precisely with Sir G. Grierson's linguistic exposition, and explains the linguistic facts simply and fully. Current opinion, in order to explain those facts, postulates not only an invasion of Aryans from the north-west, but even a double invasion, and the theory is that 'the inhabitants of the Midland represent the latest stage of Indo-Aryan immigration', and that the latest invaders entered 'into the heart of the country already occupied by the first immigrants, forcing the latter outwards in three directions, to the east, to the south and to the west'.<sup>5</sup> This theory is improbable in itself, and certainly implies a severe and bitter struggle between the second and the first immigrants, of which one would expect to find some echo in tradition, for it concerned the very heart of India, yet there is absolutely none. It is wholly unnecessary according to tradition.

Moreover, as will be shown in the next chapter, the bulk of the Rigveda was composed in the great development of brahmanism that arose under the successors of king Bharata who reigned in the upper Ganges-Jumna doab and plain. The language of the Rigveda, as Sir G. Grierson holds, represents the archaic dialect of the upper doab, and that was the region in which the Aryan speech was the purest and whence it spread outwards.<sup>1</sup> The two agree.

Lastly, there was some connexion between Sudyumna and the Uttara Kurus and Kimpuruṣas,<sup>2</sup> and that accords with the connexion which Sir G. Grierson notices between the Mundā language and the 'Pronominalized Himalayan languages'.<sup>3</sup> In every respect therefore the evidence of language accords with the Puranic accounts, and is strong testimony to the value of tradition.

These conclusions raise the question, what does tradition say about the origin of the Ailas or Aryans? It makes the Aila power begin at Allahabad, and yet distinctly suggests that they came from outside India. The legends and fables about the progenitor Purūravas Aila all connect him with the middle Himalayan region.<sup>4</sup> He was closely associated with the Gandharvas. His wife Urvaśī was a Gandharvī, as well as called an apsaras.<sup>5</sup> The places he frequented were the river Mandākinī, Alakā, the Caitraratha and Nandana forests, the mountains Gandhamādana and Meru, and the land of the Uttara Kurus—regions to which the Gandharvas were assigned.<sup>6</sup> From the Gandharvas he obtained sacrificial fire; his sons were known in the Gandharva world;<sup>7</sup> and he ultimately became united with the Gandharvas.<sup>8</sup> Further, the fables about his birth (pp. 253-4) point to that region, and two accounts connect his alleged parent Ila with the northern country Ilāvṛta, which they say was named after him.<sup>1</sup>

Now these tales are mythical,<sup>2</sup> and tradition becomes mythical when it reaches back to origins, yet such mythical tales can hardly have sprung from pure imagination, and must have been developed from some germ of reality. They certainly suggest that Purūravas's origin was in that north region; and this agrees with and explains the fact that that region, the countries in and beyond the middle of the Himalayas, has always been the sacred land of the Indians. Indian tradition knows nothing of any Aila or Aryan invasion of India from Afghanistan, nor of any gradual advance from thence eastwards. On the other hand it distinctly asserts that there was an Aila outflow of the Druhyus through the north-west into the countries beyond, where they founded various kingdoms and so introduced their own Indian religion among those nations.<sup>3</sup>

The north-west frontier never had any ancient sacred memories, and was never regarded with reverence. All ancient Indian belief and veneration were directed to the mid-Himalayan region, the only original sacred outside land;<sup>4</sup> and it was thither that rishis and kings turned their steps in devotion, never to the north-west. The list of rivers in Rigveda x, 75 is in regular order from the east to the north-west<sup>5</sup>—not the order of entrance from the north-west, but the reverse. If the Aryans entered India from the north-west, and had advanced eastward through the Panjab only as far as the Sarasvati or Jumna when the Rigvedic hymns were composed, it is very surprising that the hymn arranges the rivers, not according to their progress, but reversely from the Ganges which they had hardly reached.<sup>6</sup> This agrees better with the course of the Aila expansion and its outflow beyond the north-west.<sup>7</sup> It was, however, a route for any one travelling from the Ganges to the north-west, as the author of the hymn perhaps did.<sup>1</sup> Again, Sudas's battle with the ten kings had (as shown in the last chapter) nothing to do with the progress of the Aryans from the north-west into India, for he was an Aila king of North Pañcāla, and the Ailas (or Aryans) had entered and dominated North India long before his time. It was part of his conquests westward into the Panjab (p. 2). Further remarks that go to corroborate these conclusions will be found in the next chapter.

The notices of rivers in the Rigveda are no certain guide as to all that the Aryans knew of the geography of India then, for, while the Sindhu and Sarasvatī are mentioned often, no other rivers in N. India are alluded to more than once, twice or thrice.<sup>2</sup> The Sindhu no doubt attracted attention because of its immense size, and the Sarasvatī because of its sanctity,<sup>3</sup> which was largely due to its being in the territory of the Bhārata kings of Hastināpura, among whom (and not in the Panjab<sup>4</sup>) the development of Rigvedic brahmanism took place, as will be explained in the next chapter.<sup>5</sup> The Rigveda knows of the Sarayu, and there is no good reason for doubting that that is the river of Oudh. Its silence about the Vindhya Mts. and other geographical features proves no ignorance, when one considers its silence about the banyan (p. 125), about salt,<sup>6</sup> and about the Pāriyātra hills (the Aravalli range), which the Aryans had actually reached according to the current view.

Tradition or myth thus directly indicates that the Ailas (or Aryans) entered India from the mid-Himalayan region, and its attitude towards the NW. frontier lends no support to any invasion from that quarter.<sup>7</sup> These are very noteworthy facts. Myth suggests the country Ilāvṛta in the north as the region from which they came. Purūravas's name Aila occurs in the Rigveda and appears to be more ancient than the fable of Manu's daughter Ilā,<sup>1</sup> which seems to have been devised in order to explain that name, for such explanatory tales were common (p. 75). The suggested connexion between Ilā and Ilāvṛta may be ancient and may merit credence.<sup>2</sup> In this regard it may be noted that Sudyumna, the male form of Ilā, is said to have been a Kimpuruṣa and ultimately departed to Ilāvṛta. The Kimpuruṣas were placed in that same north region;<sup>3</sup> so that myth connects the Saudyumna stock with that land, and in some Puranas with the Northern Kurus (p. 297). If then the Ailas did not enter India from the north-west, we must, in considering tradition and the conclusions it suggests, put away all ideas drawn from that hypothesis.

<sup>7</sup> The only passages which may lend support to the theory of a north-western invasion are the two in the Rām, which make Ila king of Bālhi or Bālhika (p. 254, note 4), if these words mean Balkh; but they might mean the Vāhlīka country in the Panjab (Mārk, my translation, p. 311), and the Rām is quite untrustworthy in its traditions when uncorroborated elsewhere (pp. 82, 93).

Further light is thrown on this matter by a treaty between a Hittite king and a king of Mitanni found at Boghazkeui. It mentions, as noticed by Professor Jacobi,<sup>4</sup> certain gods who can be none other than Mitra, Varuṇa, Indra and the Nāsatyas (Aśvins). These are Indian Aryan gods,<sup>5</sup> and he has shown that they could not belong to the period prior (according to the current theory) to the separation of the Indian and Iranian branches. The date of the treaty has been fixed reliably now about 1400 B.C., and therefore the folk of Mitanni who worshipped these gods had arrived there earlier, probably late in the sixteenth century. These facts prove (1) that there was an outflow of people from India before the fifteenth century B.C.; (2) that they brought Aryan gods from India; (3) that therefore Aryans and their gods existed in India before the sixteenth century; and (4) that the Aryans had entered India earlier still. These facts and conclusions are hardly reconcilable with the current theory about the entrance of the Aryans into NW. India and the composition of the hymns of the Rigveda.<sup>6</sup>

But these facts and conclusions are in full agreement with what tradition says about the outspread of the Druhyus beyond the north-west of India (p. 264), for that is assigned to about the time No. 40 in the genealogical table (p. 146), namely, some 55 steps earlier than the Bhārata battle of 950 b. c. (p. 182); and if we allow 12 years per step (p. 183), that outflow would have begun  $950 + 660$ , that is, about 1600 b. c., and would have spread gradually to allow of the appearance of Indian gods in the treaty of 1400 b. c. Tradition shows that the Ailas or Aryans had entered North India earlier still, and had dominated the greater part of it by the time of that outflow. Their entry, calculated on the 92 steps from Purūravas to the Bhārata battle, according to the same scale, would be placed  $950 + 1104$ , that is, about 2050 b. c. Indian tradition and the facts of that treaty are thus in complete harmony, and the former furnishes a simple and sufficient explanation of the latter. This is testimony to the value of Indian tradition, and goes to show that the genealogies are substantial and may supply a scale for approximate chronological computation. Those migrants kept the names of their gods correctly, but the kings naturally modified their own names as they and their language became more separated from India.

Further, if we accept the current theory, the above conclusions from the treaty would require that the assumed Indo-Iranian period should be placed much earlier than the sixteenth century b. c.—a result that would render the theory hardly tenable. The above tradition suggests that there may have been no such period, and that the Iranians may have been an offshoot from India, for the outspread from India can not only account for the existence of gods with Indian names and kings with Iranian-like names in the treaty, but may also have led to the genesis of the Iranians. The linguistic and religious differences of Iran may be explained quite as well in this way as by the current theory.<sup>1</sup>

Vedic literature says, I believe, nothing about the entrance of the Aryans from the north-west into India. If one starts with that view, arguments for it may no doubt be discovered in the Rigveda; but if one puts aside all preconceived ideas and examines the hymns in the light of historical tradition, nothing will, I think, be found in them really incompatible with traditional history, and a great deal is elucidated thereby. Moreover, tradition explains why the sacred land of the Aryans was the region north of the mid-Himalayas—a fact which the prevalent view does not account for; and the connexion of Persia with India does not prove that the Aryans entered India from that direction, for it may find a quite possible explanation reversely in the outflow of Druhyus as just shown.

The current theory, that the Aryans invaded India through the north-west after separating from the Iranians, and entered in two streams, must face and account for the following facts and considerations: (1) Indian tradition knows nothing whatever of that. (2) The north-west and the Panjab were not regarded as an ancient home, nor with veneration or special esteem. (3) Tradition has preserved copious and definite accounts giving an entirely different description of the earliest Ailas (Aryans) and their beginnings in India. (4) The mid-Himalayan region was the sacred land, and those accounts reveal why. (5) They elucidate the Aila domination of India so that it agrees with the Aryan occupation, geographically and linguistically, altogether accurately yet quite unostentatiously. (6) Tradition makes the brahmans originally a non-Aryan institution, ascribes the earliest of the Rigvedic hymns to non-Aryan kings and rishis, and makes the earliest connexion of the Vedas to be with the eastern region and not with the Panjab, as will appear in the next chapter. (7) All this copious tradition was falsely fabricated, and the truth has been absolutely lost, if the current theory is right; is this probable? (8) If all this tradition is false, why, how, and in whose interests was it all fabricated? (9) If it is false, how comes it that the fifth point above is right? (10) Indian tradition suggests a reverse origin for the Iranians, which is linguistically tenable, which harmonizes with the Boghaz-keui treaty, and which can account for their language and religion.

CHAPTER XXVI

THE ANCIENT BRAHMANS AND THE VEDAS

SOMETHING may be discovered from historical tradition about the condition of the earliest brahmans and about the composition of the Rigveda and the other Vedas. Here we must premise that it is futile to expect to learn the truth about these matters from the priestly literature, because that was composed after the brahmans had put forward their pretensions about themselves and the Veda. Naturally they would set out therein their own version of what they then held (and what they wished others to believe) about these matters, and would say nothing that would stultify the same, as they actually did with regard to Viśvāmitra (pp. 60, 244). Facts or traditions that proved awkward for their developed pretensions would not be admitted, as has been pointed out with regard to Vyāsa (p. 10) and the kṣatriyan brahmans (p. 124). There was nothing strange in such conduct. It was simply what priesthood has not seldom done,<sup>1</sup> and the brahmans formed a priestly caste supreme in position and education, pride and influence. The views here put forward were not reached through any preconceived speculation, but evolved themselves gradually out of all the preceding investigation, and are all based on definite statements which are cited. They are all drawn from traditions, which could not have been fabricated in late times, as will appear, but are ancient, and of which the brahmans have been the custodians for more than two thousand years. They are a signal illustration of the fact, that the Puranic and Epic brahmans preserved ancient traditions, quite unconscious that those traditions often belied the brahmanic pretensions which were developed later (p. 61).

The accounts given in chapters XVII to XXII show what tradition discloses about ancient rishis and brahmans, with an attempt to fix their chronological position, the results of which are exhibited in pages 191-2. Those accounts bring out the following particulars touching the earliest positions of the great brahman families,

The Vasiṣṭhas were connected originally and for long with Ayodhyā, and slightly with the junior kingdom of Videha. The Bhārgavas consisted of two branches, one derived from Cyavana and the other from Uśanas-Śukra. Cyavana was connected with Śaryāti and the country of Ānarta, and his descendants afterwards with the Haihayas who occupied the neighbouring region of the Narbada, when apparently the Śāryāta kingdom had fallen. Uśanas was the priest of the Daityas and Dānavas (or asuras) in mid North India, and his descendants disappeared. The earliest Āṅgirasas alleged (unless we reckon Bṛhaspati, the priest of the devas against Uśanas) were connected with Māndhāṭṛ king of Ayodhyā; the earliest Āṅgirasa rishi named was connected with Hariścandra king of Ayodhyā; and the earliest definite Āṅgiras was priest to the Vaiśāli dynasty, and so also were his near descendants. The earliest Ātreyas, Prabhākara, was not connected as priest with any dynasty, though he married the daughters of the Paurava king Raudrāśva; and the first well-known Ātreyas, Datta, became attached to the Haihaya king, after the Haihayas had broken with Cyavana's descendants. The first mention of any Kāśyapa brahman occurs with Rāma Jāmadagnya the Bhārgava in Madhyadeśa. These were the five famous families that were brahmans from their beginning. The Agastyas arose later and their origin is uncertain, yet tradition connects them with the Dekhan. The other brahman families and gotras that sprang from kṣatriya stocks do not concern us here.

It thus appears that of the true brahman families the earliest began with the Mānvās, as the Vasiṣṭhas at Ayodhyā and Cyavana's branch of the Bhārgavas in Ānarta; or began with Daityas and Dānavas,<sup>1</sup> as Uśanas-Śukra's branch of the Bhārgavas. Those that arose later began either with the Mānvās, as the Āṅgirasas in the Ayodhyā and Vaiśāli kingdoms; or with the outermost Aila race in the west, as the Ātreyas with the Haihayas; or later in Madhyadeśa, as the Kāśyapas with the Bhārgava Rāma Jāmadagnya; or in the Dekhan, as the Agastyas probably. Not a single brahman was connected as priest with any of the early Aila kings; merely three intermarriages are alleged, namely, Apnavāna's with Nahuṣa's daughter Ruci (p. 197), Yayāti's with Uśanas's daughter

Devayāṇī (p. 86) and Prabhākara's mentioned above. Thus the earliest brahmans were priests to the Mānvās or to the Daityas and Dānavas, but never to the early Ailas. Brhaspati, the so-called Āngirasa priest of the devas, makes no exception, for he is not connected as priest with any Aila. No brahman then was priest to an Aila, that is Aryan, king in the very earliest times (except in a few late brahmanical fables). 'Mānava brahmans'<sup>1</sup> and 'Mānava rishis'<sup>2</sup> are alluded to, but never I believe 'Aila brahmans or rishis'.

This conclusion is not likely to have been the result of fabrication, and the negative argument is corroborated by the direct fact that tradition speaks of the earliest Aila kings actually opposing brahmans, but never says that any of the earliest Mānvās did so. Two occasions are alleged when early Mānva kings had disagreements with brahmans, namely, very early between Nimi and 'Vasiṣṭha' (p. 215), and much later between Marutta and Brhaspati (p. 157), and both arose, not through antagonism, but through injured friendship, because those brahmans failed to sacrifice as those kings desired. Quite different was the attitude of the earliest Aila kings. They are praised in general terms sometimes in fables; thus Purūravas is extolled,<sup>3</sup> Nahuṣa and Yayāti made large gifts of cattle,<sup>4</sup> and Yayāti helped the devas against the Daityas and Dānavas;<sup>5</sup> but when spoken of in connexion with brahmans they are severely censured. So it is said that Purūravas made war on vipers and robbed them of their jewels, he was deaf to advice, and intoxicated with power perished through the curse of the maharṣis.<sup>6</sup> Also he coveted the golden sacrificial floor of the rishis of Naimiṣa forest and was killed by them.<sup>7</sup> His son Āyu was chosen by the rishis and behaved righteously;<sup>8</sup> and it may be noted that he married the daughter of Svarbhānu, who was a Dānava and asura.<sup>1</sup> But his son Nahuṣa, who made no such alliance and married his own sister (p. 86), became intoxicated with pride,<sup>2</sup> made the rishis pay tribute and oppressed them grievously.<sup>3</sup> Nothing of the kind is said about Yayāti, and he married Uśanas-Śukra's daughter Devayāṇī and the Dānava king Vṛṣaparvan's daughter,<sup>4</sup> yet he was cursed by Uśanas on Devayāṇī's complaint.<sup>5</sup>

There can be no doubt that herein we have ancient tradition. The close connexion constantly asserted between Uśanas-Śukra and the Daityas and Dānavas<sup>6</sup> could not have been the product of later times, when the Bhārgavas were a renowned family and those people were regarded as demonic. So also as regards the early Ailas, because from them were descended the Yādavas and Pauravas, from the Yādavas sprang Kṛṣṇa, and from the Pauravas the famous Bhāratas. To praise Uśanas-Śukra<sup>7</sup> and these early Ailas<sup>8</sup> would be the natural inclination of after times; but to depict the latter as inimical to brahmans would be repugnant, hence the allusions that present them as such are specially noteworthy.

Brahmanism then originally was not an Aila or Aryan institution. The earliest brahmans were connected with the non-Aryan peoples, and were established among them when the Ailas entered. This is corroborated by the close connexion that existed between them and the Daityas, Dānavas and asuras. It has just been pointed out as regards Uśanas-Śukra. The Dānava Śambara is represented as devoted to brahmans.<sup>1</sup> It is said that the Bhārgavas were purohitas to Hiranyaśaśipu,<sup>2</sup> the original Daitya monarch,<sup>3</sup> and that 'Vasiṣṭha' was his hotṛ.<sup>4</sup> Further, it is often declared that Indra incurred the sin of brahmanicide by killing Vṛtra<sup>5</sup> and Namuci,<sup>6</sup> so that those two famous Dānavas were brahmans.<sup>7</sup> The ideas, that brahmans were priests to demons, that demons themselves were brahmans, and that the chief of the gods incurred the most heinous sin by killing demons, were so grotesque, if not blasphemous, to orthodox brahmanism, that they could never have been imagined in later times, and are not, I believe, to be found in brahmanical literature. Indeed in the Rigveda Indra is often praised for slaying Vṛtra and other demons,<sup>8</sup> so that these ideas must be more ancient still. In the Rigveda Uśanas (who is a figure of the distant past) was rehabilitated,<sup>9</sup> and Indra's sin of killing brahmans had become his great glory of destroying demons;<sup>10</sup> so change had taken place before that, and tradition has preserved ideas more primitive than the hymns that speak of these matters.

There is nothing in the names of the great brahman families inconsistent with this conclusion. Kaśyapa may be non-Aryan, for it invites comparison with kaśipu in the name of the Daitya monarch Hiranyaśaśipu. Āngiras and Atri might be non-Aryan quite as well as Aryan. The only names that ostensibly are Sanskrit are Bṛgu and Vasiṣṭha, and yet strangely enough they are those that are most definitely connected with non-Aryans, for the Vasiṣṭhas were originally priests to the Mānavas of Ayodhyā, and the two earliest Bṛgus were associated, Cyavana with the Mānavas of Ānarta, and Uśanas-Śukra with the Daityas and Dānavas. The Sanskritic look of their names then does not prove Aryan origin;

What the very early brahmans were is evidenced by what is said about their doings. They are sometimes connected with sacrifices, especially in late tales and late versions of older stories,<sup>2</sup> but what is constantly associated with them is tapas, 'austerities'.<sup>3</sup> That was their chief pursuit and main exercise, and its efficacy was in their belief to acquire superhuman powers which would enable them to dominate the natural and supernatural worlds: hence it is often alleged that by tapas they (and other men also<sup>4</sup>) gained from the gods the boons they wanted, or that the gods were terrified and endeavoured to break their tapas. It was in that age what sacrifice became afterwards.<sup>5</sup> Their reputation rested on their claim to possess 'occult' faculties and powers and the popular belief that they possessed them. Thus it appears that the original brahmans were not so much priests as 'adepts' in matters supernatural, 'masters' of magico-religious force, wizards, medicine-men.<sup>6</sup> Their reputation gave them very high rank, equal to that of their princes. They do not appear to have constituted a caste then. It is said brahmans were united (sangata) with ksatriyas originally,<sup>7</sup> and as

<sup>4</sup> The Dānavas were noted for tapas; see their character in Vā 68, 1-3 and Bd iii, 6, 1-3, where the Vā text appears preferable. The Daityas were drinkers of soma, but not the Dānavas, so Bd iii, 6, 14: differently in Vā 68, 14; but from the context Bd reading seems preferable and Vā corrupt.

<sup>6</sup> J. Kennedy expressed a somewhat similar view (JRAS, 1920, p. 40), after I reached this conclusion. Pad vi, 230, 20 says, 'Of yore in the Kṛta age brahmans were tapasvins, a non-brahman was never a tapasvin'. Magical powers were ascribed to the earliest rishis and magical wiles to the Daityas and Dānavas. Cf. Hastings' Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, v, 1-2.

shown (p. 244) there was no difficulty in early times in kṣatriyas' becoming brahmans. Thus it is intelligible that intermarriages took place between the brahmans and the early Aila royal family.<sup>1</sup>

While tradition thus clearly indicates that brahmanism was alien to the earliest Ailas, it yet offers very little suggestion as to what their religious practices were. It is said that Purūravas obtained sacrificial fire from the Gandharvas, learnt the way of making fire from aśvattha firesticks and sacrificed therewith, and that out of that fire he himself constituted three separate fires.<sup>2</sup> He and his successors therefore performed sacrifices of some kind, and appear to have sacrificed for themselves, for nothing is said of any priests in connexion with them, except that in a few late brahmanical tales or additions brahmans are made their priests. Thus, the Śoḍaśa-rājika says<sup>3</sup> that Yayāti offered multitudes of various sacrifices and lavished wealth on the brahmans, but its description shows by its sacrificial anachronisms that it has been elaborated by late brahmanic hands, and in fact it greatly overdoes its eulogy of the kings for brahmanism.

Marriage connexions tended to bring brahmans and the early Aila kings together and remove their antagonism, and Yayāti's eldest brother Yati became a muni (p. 86). Further, the victorious expansion of the Ailas over the non-Aryans seriously affected the position and prestige of the brahmans and discredited their magical pretensions, so that those who adhered to the non-Aryans shared in their downfall and disappeared, as happened with Uśanas-Śukra's descendants (p. 196). Hence regard for their own future would have inclined them towards the Ailas. That necessitated some assimilation of their religious beliefs and practices with those of the Ailas, and caused a gradual change from magic to religious worship, from medicine-man to priest proper.

Approximation first appeared among the outermost Yādavas in the west, for Cyavana's descendants (Bhārgavas) became priests to the Haihayas (pp. 197, 265), and, when they broke with the Haihayas, the Ātreyas succeeded to their position (pp. 198, 229).

The Kāśyapas arose in Madhyadeśa after the Haihaya devastations (p. 232). During all that period the Paurava kingdom in Madhyadeśa was in abeyance, and there is no mention of any brahmans with the northern branch of the Yādavas (p. 261), or the Ānavas or the Druhyus. Later on, the Āṅgiratas, who appeared in the non-Aila kingdom of Vaiśālī, moved west to the Aila realm of Kāśi (p. 220) and then to the newly revived Paurava kingdom in the Ganges-Jumna doab in Bharata's time, where they flourished greatly and admitted into their ranks the kṣatriyan brahmans who developed soon afterwards among his descendants (pp. 247 f.). Kanva Kāśyapa was there in Duṣyanta's time (p. 232). In fact, in the Ganges-Jumna doab, the region specially occupied by the Ailas, it was not until Duṣyanta's and Bharata's period that any brahman became connected with them as priest (p. 232).

Those brahmans who associated with the Ailas thus became established and multiplied into the great brahman families, and the others disappeared or took lower rank,<sup>1</sup> except the Vasiṣṭhas who maintained their high position in the powerful Mānva kingdom of Ayodhyā. The Aila kings appear to have been their own sacrificers, and the brahmans on becoming established among them assimilated Aila religious ideas and rites and became priests, and Aila princes also became brahman-priests. Brahmanism thus gradually changed its character and became the well-known system, priestly and not magical,<sup>2</sup> which took its great development among the Bhāratas as displayed especially in the Rigvedic hymns of the times of Vadhryaśva, Divodāsa and their successors.<sup>3</sup> It owed a great deal to Bharata and his descendants. He was a powerful and pious monarch, he adopted the brahman Bharadvāja as his son, and not only were his successors (p. 159) friendly to brahmans, but many of them also became brahmans (chapter XXIII). The infusion of royal scions into the ranks of the brahmans must have enhanced brahmanhood greatly and also no doubt modified it, and therefrom arose a fresh, vigorous and illustrious development of it with apparently a strong stimulus to sacrificial worship, as the statements infra about the Veda, sacrifice and dharma also indicate. The Ailas Aryanized the brahmans<sup>1</sup> as they did the other peoples, and then the new brahmanism became the stronghold of Aryanism.

Another conclusion follows from this exposition. Bhārgavas and Ātreyas became priests first to Aila kings in W. India, but, broadly speaking, brahmans did not become priests to Aila kings elsewhere until about the time of Duṣyanta and Bharata; and the table on pp. 144-7 shows that by that time the Ailas (Aryans) had dominated the whole of N. India (excluding the three Mānva kingdoms) and the NW. Dekhan, that is, they had reached their full expansion except in distant outlying regions. The brahmans thus had little to do with the Aryan conquest, and in fact it proceeded in great measure against them while they were associated with non-Aryans. It was the Aila kṣatriyas who achieved the whole, and the brahmans joined them when that was practically effected. Hence one reason is clear why, as noticed above (pp. 8, 9), it is kṣatriya genealogies, and they alone, which give an account how the Aryan domination took place, and why the brahmanic literature has really nothing to say about that great transformation. Where the brahmans did claim some credit, as in the story of Māthava, king of Videha (Videha), and his priest Gotama Rāhūgaṇa,<sup>2</sup> it does not refer to the Ailas, for Videha was a Mānva kingdom.

The foregoing sketch has explained the development of brahmanism in its general aspect, and we may now consider what an examination of the reputed authorship of the Rigvedic hymns discloses.<sup>3</sup> A

<sup>2</sup> Śatapatha Brāhm i, 4, 10-19. See p. 224, note <sup>18</sup>. It is a fable, for it is discredited by tradition about Videha as narrated in chap. XXIV; and, if Agni Vaiśrānara went burning along the earth from the Sarasvatī to Videha, Agni burnt over the Paurava territory (including N. Pañcāla) and the Ayodhyā realm, two of the most famous and best cultivated regions even in early times—which is absurd. If it enshrines any historical truth, it might mean that the reformed brahmanism passed from the Bhārata kingdom to Ayodhyā and then to Videha.

<sup>3</sup> The making of hymns was not confined to brahmans, for it is said that among kṣatriyas Manu and Pūrūravas Aila were mantra-vādins, and among vaiśyas Bhalandana, Vatsa or Vāsāśva (read Vatsapri?) and Sankīla were hymn-makers : Mat 145, 115-17 : Bd ii, 32, 120-2. See p. 97.

Further, the most ancient kings and rishis above-mentioned, to whom hymns are attributed, were not Ailas. The kings were all Mānavas, and the rishis were connected with the Mānavas or with Daityas and Dānavas. Only one hymn is ascribed to an early Aila, viz. x, 95 to Pururavas, yet it was obviously not composed by him but by some later author, just as were x, 10 and 86. Not a single other hymn is attributed to any early Aila king until Sivi Ausīnara (x, 179) and Gāthi or Gādhi (iii, 19 to 22). The hymns therefore that are said to be the most ancient are ascribed to Mānavas and their rishis, and not to Ailas. Those Mānva kings all reigned at Ayodhyā or in the Vaiśāli realm, that is, in the eastern region, except Śāryāta who was in the west. No hymns are assigned to any one who lived in the north-west until Sivi. These facts supply ground for the declaration that the Vedas were first chanted in the eastern region<sup>10</sup>—not in the north-west. They are significant facts which must be accounted for on the current view, that the Aryans entered India from the north-west and composed the Rigvedic hymns in the Panjab country. They rather suggest that the making of hymns passed with the above described approximation of the brahmans to the Ailas; and it is probable that the Aila Viśvāmitra on becoming a brahman modified the older and perhaps cruder brahmanic character and functions; and, if so, the difference would have accentuated the hostility that Vasiṣṭha (who was a Mānva brahman) showed to his brahmanhood (p. 244). The fact that those earliest Mānva hymns appear now in Sanskrit does not disprove their non-Aila origin, for they would naturally have been Sanskritized in the course of time, as has been noticed above with regard to non-Aryan names.

The next great stage in the composition of the hymns began with the above-mentioned development of brahmanism in connexion with sacrifice after Bharata's time, culminating with the rishis, Nos. 49 &c. in the chronological list (p. 191). The bulk of the Rigvedic hymns date from after that period. His territory included the tract between the rivers Drṣadvatī and Sarasvatī, and he sacrificed on the latter,<sup>1</sup> which was a large river then. That region probably had some sanctity before, for on the Sarasvatī was Uśanas-Śukra's tīrtha Kapālamocana,<sup>2</sup> and the river constituted the boundary between the Panjab and the Ganges-Jumna basin,<sup>3</sup> whether it flowed into the Rājputana desert, or especially if the sea extended northwards into that desert then (p. 299). That region was held by Bharata's successors till long afterwards, and the connexion with them and their development of brahmanism apparently made it become specially sacred.<sup>4</sup> This is supported by the general statement (ignoring special māhātmyas) that the most sacred region in the Kṛta age was Naimiṣa forest, in the Tretā Puṣkara, in the Dvāpara Kurukṣetra, and in the Kali age the Ganges.<sup>5</sup> Naimisa was on the R. Gomati<sup>6</sup> in the Ayodhyā kingdom, thus the site of earliest sanctity in India is placed among the Mānvas in the eastern region. So the brahmans whom Purūravas came into special conflict with were the rishis of Naimiṣa as mentioned above. The Dvāpara age began between Divodāsa's and Sudās's times (p. 177), Kuru reigned early in it (p. 148), from him the region of the Sarasvatī obtained the name Kurukṣetra, and so both became specially sacred in that age.<sup>1</sup> The region was called Brahmāvarta also,<sup>2</sup> though from what time is not clear.

Brahmanism thus appears to have developed in accordance with Aila ideas, and to have owed much of its advance to the influence of kṣatriyas,<sup>3</sup> first, of Viśvāmitra and his sons, and afterwards mainly of the Bhārata princes and kṣatriyan brahmans. It continued to flourish in harmony with later kings of that family, and consolidated its position as a caste, especially in connexion with sacrifice. That such Aila influences did produce modifications is suggested by the remarkable statements made in the Rāmāyana (which can hardly have been the outcome of later brahmanical views); first, that, while eastern and southern kings and kings of the distant Panjab were invited to Daśaratha's sacrifice at Ayodhyā, none of the neighbouring Paurava (Bhārata) and Yādava kings, who flourished then in all the middle region of N. India (pp. 170-2, 276), were invited; and secondly, that Daśaratha called in the help, not of brahmans from Madhyadeśa, but of the rustic Rṣyaśrūga from Aṅga.<sup>4</sup> It was at that time that the great development of brahmanism had taken place among the Bhāratas. Ayodhyā and the Vasiṣṭhas had no association then with that brahmanically élite region. Brahmanism as it took shape under the Bhāratas apparently differed from that at Ayodhyā. Moreover all those brahmans had little in common with the non-Aryan tribes of the Dekhan (though Dekhan kings were invited to the sacrifice), as is suggested by the maltreatment of munis by Rāksasas in the story of Rāma, for estrangement grew into hostility, which when developed was portrayed in the frequent stories how rishis were afflicted by such folk stigmatized and mythologized as demonic—a view which was carried back into earlier times in later brahmanic stories. Ultimately brahmanism as developed among the Bhāratas became the dominant form.

from Brahmā's mouths at the beginning of creation (p. 30), yet other statements occur which betray some recollection of their real commencement. Thus it is said,<sup>1</sup> that the mantras were put together (samhita) in the Tretā age;<sup>2</sup> that the Vedas were put together at the beginning of the Tretā age and were arranged in the Dvāpara age;<sup>3</sup> and that sacrifice (yajña) was instituted at the same time,<sup>4</sup> and so dharma was constituted then.<sup>5</sup> This taken literally is erroneous, because tradition suggests that the Tretā age began about Sagara's time, and most of the rishis who composed the great bulk of the hymns were much later.<sup>6</sup> According to that reckoning Viśvāmitra and his sons (with whom began the real Vedic age, as mentioned above) lived towards the close of the Kṛta age, and so also Jamadagni; Ucathya, Bṛhaspati and Samvarta lived at its end; Dirghatamas and the first Bharadvāja at the beginning of the Tretā, and the earliest Ātreyas hymn-makers about the same time. The above statements however would be true to this extent, that the hymns composed by these rishis would have formed incipient collections (samhitās) among the Viśvāmitras, Bhārgavas, Āṅgiratas and Ātreyas about the commencement of the Tretā age. The alleged institution of sacrifice then agrees with the remarks above about its development soon after Bharata's time.

The next stage to be noticed is that the division of ṛc, yajus and sāman had apparently come into existence before the time of Hiranyanābha, king of Kosala, because he and his disciple, king Kṛta, constructed sāmhitās of sāmans, which were called the 'eastern sāmans',<sup>5</sup> and the chanters of them were called Kārtas (p. 173). Here also appears the influence of kṣatriyas. This and the following compilation were in the Dvāpara age, and the statement above that the Vedas were arranged in that age is true.

By the time of king Brahmadatta of S. Pañcāla (pp. 148, 165) the collections of hymns appear to have been largely constituted, for they were definitely combined into a whole by his two ministers,<sup>6</sup> Kāndarika (or Pundarika) and Subālaka (or Gālava) Bābhravya Pañcāla.<sup>7</sup> Kāndarika is described as dvi-veda, chandoga and adhvaryu,<sup>8</sup> and as the promulgator (pravartaka) of the Veda-śāstra.<sup>9</sup> Bābhravya Pañcāla was bahyṛca and ācārya<sup>10</sup> and knew all the śāstras;<sup>11</sup> he composed the Śiksā<sup>1</sup> and instituted it;<sup>2</sup> he also devised the Krama, mastered it thoroughly and instituted it.<sup>3</sup> This tradition is corroborated by the statement in Vedic literature that Bābhravya Pāñcāla was the author of the Kramapāṭha of the R̥k-samhitā,<sup>4</sup> though it gives no clue to his position or time.

These statements say Rigvedic hymns had been made into a collection by Kāṇḍarīka. His epithets dri-veda, chandoga and adhvaryu mean (I take it) that he was specially proficient in the sāman and yajus departments. Bābhravya, working apparently on that collection, applied himself specially to the Rigveda as his epithet bahvṛca suggests, and composed the Śiksā and devised the Kramapāṭha. Tradition thus declares that the first substantial compilation and study of the hymns of the Veda in its triple departments of rc, yajus and sāman were made in S. Pāñcāla by these two brahman ministers of Brahmadatta,<sup>5</sup> whose position may be estimated as about a century and a half before the Bhārata battle (pp. 148, 164–5). But Kāṇḍarīka's compilation was not the Veda as we have it now, first, because certain hymns, such as <sup>4</sup> Weber, Hist. of Ind. Lit., p. 34, showing the error of the above reading Kāmaśāstra, it being also inconsistent with the character of these persons as devotees of yoga (ninth note above). The error is explained by Vātsyāyana's statement in his kāmasūtra i, that Śvetaketu composed a work on kāma, it was abridged by Bābhravya Pāñcāla, and he studied Bābhravya's work. It is shown from many passages (pp. 164–6, and next chap.) that Brahmadatta (and therefore his minister Bābhravya) was long prior to Śvetaketu, and Vātsyāyana's single statement making his Bābhravya posterior to Śvetaketu cannot, by identifying the two Bābhravyas, override that finding; for he wrote eight or nine centuries later than Śvetaketu (Vātsyāyana—the Author of the Kāmasūtra; by Haranchandra Chakladar: Journ. of Depart. of Letters, Calc. Univ., vol. IV). His Bābhravya was clearly another, later than Śvetaketu. There is nothing improbable in this, because Babhru was a very common name (see the Index, and also Vedic Index), and therefore Bābhravya also; and two Bābhravyas of Pāñcāla some four or five centuries apart are nothing surprising after what has been pointed out in chap. XI. The Mat and Pad have confused the two, and altered the earlier Bābhravya's work, the Kramapāṭha, to the latter's, a Kāmaśāstra. This is only another instance of the confusion of persons of the same name, so often pointed out (pp. 130–4, 203–4, 213, 234, &c.).

Devāpi's for instance (x, 98 : p. 165), could not have been included since they were later; and secondly, because tradition is unanimous that Vyāsa 'arranged' the Veda, which means a real arrangement of the Veda as it was finally settled.

The final compilation was made after Devāpi's time and not until that of Vyāsa, who followed him by about half a century, because hymns are attributed to Asita or Devala, and Devala was a contemporary of the Pāṇḍavas (p. 233) and so of Vyāsa. Vyāsa<sup>1</sup> must have added all the hymns that were incorporated latest, and completed the canon. Tradition entirely supports this. It says generally that he arranged the Veda,<sup>2</sup> he divided the Veda into four,<sup>3</sup> he divided the four-pāda Veda into four;<sup>4</sup> and there are explicit statements that he compiled the Rigveda.<sup>5</sup> Both tradition and the latest hymns in the Rigveda therefore show the time when the canon was established, and tradition proclaims the man by whom that was done. Only a rishi of commanding ability, knowledge and eminence could have made it a canon accepted unquestioningly thereafter, and that is exactly the character and position which tradition unanimously attributes to Vyāsa, a rishi pre-eminent above all others.<sup>6</sup> He would probably have completed that work about a quarter of a century before the Bhārata battle, that is, about 980 B. C. (p. 182). The priestly literature has suppressed all these facts (p. 10).

There is no definite tradition about the Atharvaveda, but some statements throw light on it.

First, as regards its names. The early mention of its songs occurs under the names Atharrāṇas and Āṅgirāsas, and the oldest name is Atharvāṅgirasas.<sup>1</sup> Now tradition calls the earliest certain Āṅgiras Atharvan Āṅgiras (p. 218), and these two names and the compound of both are virtually the same appellation. The Atharvāṅgirasa rishis began in the kingdom of Vaiśāli (p. 219), that is, among the Māṇvas and not the Ailas. The hymns are also specially connected with the Bṛhgus,<sup>2</sup> who were originally associated with the Māṇvas, and so the ancient Bhārgava Uśanas, the teacher of the Daityas (that is, non-Ailas) is called Atharvaṇām nidhi.<sup>3</sup> It is said there was a Vasiṣṭha named Atharvan, and the appellation Atharvanidhi is given to two Vasiṣṭhas (p. 207); and the Vasiṣṭhas has belonged to the Māṇvas of Ayodhyā. All these names therefore connect these songs with the Māṇvas and not the Ailas, and mainly with the eastern region (p. 312).

Next, as regards this Veda's character. It is a heterogeneous collection of the most popular spells current among the masses, and its most salient teaching is sorcery.<sup>4</sup> Now the populace was non-Aila (p. 290), and magical power was the particular pursuit of the earliest brahmans, who belonged to the non-Ailas, as shown above. These features indicate that these songs began with and embody the ancient beliefs and practices of the peoples whom the Ailas subjugated, so that naturally the spirit which breathes therein is that of a prehistoric age,<sup>5</sup> of the times prior to the higher development of brahmanism among the Ailas.

Thirdly, may be noticed the word brahma. The original thing denoted by it was, as I understand, the magical power, whether incantation, charm or what not,<sup>6</sup> by which a man could exert influence over all natural and supernatural beings—what anthropologists now call mana.<sup>7</sup> The Atharvan songs were brahma, and the man who employed that was brahman, the wizard or medicine-man.<sup>8</sup>

So the Atharvan books called this Veda the Brahmaveda,<sup>1</sup> and claimed that it was the Veda for the brahman.<sup>2</sup> They used the words in the earlier sense, and the other Vedic books regarding (I suggest) the words from the later point of view of reformed brahmanism disputed that claim. It is said that in former times only a Vasiṣṭha could act as brahman<sup>3</sup>—quite appropriately, since the songs were then Mānva.

Speaking generally therefore, the Atharvaveda was the accumulation of magical beliefs, observances and practices, starting from the non-Aila races and gaining accretions from the Ailas and the people at large; while the Rigveda with its ancillary Yajus and Sāman was the religious expression of mainly the Ailas or Aryans as developed through reformed brahmanism and exhibited in sacrifice.

What Vyāsa did seems to have been this. The statement that he arranged and divided the four-pūda Veda into four suggests (1) that, though re, sāman, and probably yajus and Atharvan<sup>4</sup> were distinguished before, as shown above, yet they had not been treated distinctly, all co-existed as four pādas in one general Veda, and he definitely separated them and constituted them respectively as four distinct Vedas: or (2) that, at any rate, he expressly and formally fixed the fourfold division and completed the canon of each Veda in definite shape, which became final subject to small modifications afterwards.<sup>5</sup> He had four disciples and entrusted to each of them one Veda, viz. the Rigveda to Paila, the Yajurveda to Vaiśampāyana, the Sāmaveda to Jaimini and the Atharvaveda to Sumantu.<sup>6</sup> The priestly literature has suppressed all this just as it has ignored Vyāsa (p. 9), for something of this sort must have taken place on any theory of the compilation of the four Vedas.

The Vedic age thus closed roundly at about 1000 B. C.<sup>1</sup> Anteriorly it stretched back for centuries, as the chronological list on pages 191-2 read with pages 144-9 shows. There was a vast difference in time between the earliest hymns and the latest in the Rigveda. Hymns handed down orally during those centuries could hardly have escaped being gradually modified in their diction as the language gradually changed, and when they were at last collected into the canon, their diction would be rather that of the age when the collection was formed than that of the times when they were composed.<sup>2</sup> Hence it is not surprising, if the hymns betray no marked differences of language commensurate with the long Vedic period. They were sacred, but their text would not have attained to fixity and verbal veneration until the canon was completed and closed. Yet even then phonetic changes went on, and the samhitā text did not take its final shape till after the completion of the Brāhmaṇas, or about 600 B.C.<sup>3</sup>

CHAPTER XXVII

THE VEDIC SCHOOLS AND TEACHERS AND THE BRĀHMANAS

THOUGH the Puranas say very little about secular history after the Bhārata battle, yet the Puranic brahmans incorporated notices of the Vedic schools and later teachers. The development of those schools among Vyāsa's disciples is described best in the Vāyu and Brahmānda, less fully in the Viṣṇu, and the Bhāgavata has copied less clearly and intelligently.<sup>4</sup> Many of the teachers named<sup>5</sup> are alluded to in Vedic literature, but their assignment in those several schools does not, I believe, always tally with their assignment in that literature; yet there may be truth in both, since teachers were no doubt masters of more than one Veda. The account in the first two Puranas mentioned was obviously drawn up and added by the Puranic brahmans themselves, and deserves attention, because they had knowledge of those schools, and because the account was endorsed by the brahmanic Viṣṇu and again by the still more brahmanic Bhāgavata.<sup>1</sup> As I have not studied Vedic literature closely, I cannot venture to discuss intricacies, and so merely set out the account briefly here with a few comments. Care must be taken not to confuse different persons of the same name, for the account shows there were many such; thus, as will appear, there were two Sumantus and several Yājñavalkyas, and the Jaimini who taught Pauspīṇḍya was great grandson of Vyāsa's disciple Jaimini.<sup>2</sup>

Rigveda.<sup>3</sup> Paila made two versions and gave them to his disciples, one to Indrapramati<sup>4</sup> and the other to Vāśkala. Vāśkala made four sāmhitās of his version and gave them severally to his four disciples, Bodhya, Agnimāṭhara, Parāśara<sup>5</sup> and Yājñavalkya. Indrapramati taught his version to Māṇḍūkeya; he taught it to his son Satyaśravas; he to Satyahita; and he to his son Satyaśrī. Satyaśrī had three great disciples, Devamitra Śākalya, Rathītara Śākapūrṇa<sup>6</sup> and Vāśkali Bharadvāja; and they established śūkhās. Śākalya made five sāmhitās and taught them to his five disciples, Mudgala, Golaka, Khāliya, Vatsa and Śaiśireya. He was very conceited.<sup>7</sup> King 'Janaka' of Videha performed a horse-sacrifice and a great concourse of rishis attended it. He offered great wealth (including slaves<sup>8</sup>) to whoever should be the greatest among them, so they challenged one another to discussion. Yājñavalkya, son of Brahmavāha, vanquished them all with his questions, and then challenged Śākalya with the penalty that whichever failed should forfeit his life. He answered all Śākalya's questions, but Śākalya could not answer his single question and so perished.<sup>1</sup> Yājñavalkya then carried off the prize.<sup>2</sup> Śākapūrṇa Rathitara made three saṃhitās and also a nirukta. He had four disciples, Ketava, Dālaki,<sup>3</sup> Śatabalāka and Naigama.<sup>4</sup> Vāśkali Bharadvāja made three saṃhitās, and had three disciples, Nandāyanīya, Pannagārī and Aryava.

Yajurveda.<sup>5</sup> Vaiśampāyana made 86 saṃhitās (27, Viṣṇu) and all his disciples received them except Yājñavalkya, who was discarded because of his presumption. Those 86 disciples fashioned saṃhitās, and comprised three groups distinguished geographically, the northern, the madhyadeśya and the eastern, the chiefs of which were respectively Śyāmāyani, Āsuri and Ālambi. They were all called Carakas and Carakādhvaryus, and (says the Viṣṇu) Taittiriyas. Yājñavalkya, called Brahmarāti,<sup>6</sup> fashioned independently separate yajuses,<sup>7</sup> and had 15 disciples, Kanva, Madhyamādina, &c. (names given): they were called Vājins. So there were 101 recensions altogether.

All these occurrences and names are explained in a story,<sup>8</sup> which consists largely of fable and grew out of a misunderstanding of names. It says (among other things) that Yājñavalkya Brahmarāti when discarded had to disgorge the yajuses he had learnt from Vaiśampāyana, and the other disciples picked them up; that he then worshipped the sun and obtained his own special yajuses from the sun; and that the name Vājin arose because he was aśva-rūpa. Now vājin can be synonymous with vāja-sani, the name of a

Yajñavalkya; this Yajñavalkya was (either Vājasani or) Vājasancya; hence his disciples, the Vājasaneyas of the White Yajus, were called shortly Vājins: but vājin was misunderstood as a 'horse', and so he is styled asvārūpa.<sup>1</sup> Similarly, Tittiri was apparently the chief of the disciples of the Black Yajus,<sup>2</sup> and his followers were the Taittirīyas.

This Yajñavalkya as Vaiśampāyana's disciple would have been prior to Janamejaya III, and his teaching appears to have been adopted by that king, for, it is said, Janamejaya established the Vājasaneyaka school in disregard of a Vaiśampāyana and in spite of his curse, but ultimately abdicated.<sup>3</sup> In other respects this account of the Yajurveda, and especially of the Black Yajus, appears from its brevity and indefiniteness and the large number of disciples and recensions to have contracted the succession of teachers; and the three leaders of the Taittirīyas, Śyāmāyani, Āsuri and Ālambi, should be placed soon after Adhisimakṛṣṇa's time, if this Āsuri is the same as Pañcaśikha's teacher (see infra).

Sāmareda.<sup>4</sup> Jaimini taught this to his son Sumantu, he to his son Sutvan, and he to his son Sukarman. Sukarman Jaimini made a thousand sāmhitās of it.<sup>5</sup> He had two famous disciples, Pausyañji or Pauspiñji<sup>6</sup> and Hiranyanābha Kausalya. Pauspiñji made 500 sāmhitās and taught them to his four disciples, who were called the 'northern sāman chanters'. Hiranyanābha made 500 also (15, Viṣṇu) and taught them to his disciples, who were called the 'eastern sāman chanters'. Pauspiñji's disciples were Laugākṣi (or Lokākṣi), Kuthumi, Kuśitin and Lāngali. Laugākṣi had five disciples, and their schools were those of Rāṇayaniya, Tandiputra, &c. (names given). Kuthumi had his three sons as his disciples, Aurasa,

Hiranyanābha Kausalya's disciple was prince Krta. He made 24 sāmhitās, and declared them to his disciples, Rāda, Gautama, Parāśara, &c. (names given); and they were the Kārta<sup>4</sup> sāman chanters. Paṇḍi and Krta were the most famous of all sāman chanters. This statement about Hiranyanābha, Krta and his disciples is wrongly introduced here, for they belonged to a much earlier period (p. 173): it has been inserted in order to bring them into the scheme of Vedic schools derived from Vyāsa.

Atharvaveda.<sup>5</sup> Sumantu divided it into two and taught it to Kabandha. Kabandha divided it into two again and gave one part to Pathya and the other to Devadarśa (or Vedasparśa). The latter made four versions and taught them to his four disciples, Moda, Brahmabala, Pippalāda and Śaulkāyani. The Pathyas had three divisions, those of Jājali,<sup>6</sup> Kumudādi and a 'Śaunaka'. 'Śaunaka' made two sāmhitās, and gave one to Babhru and the other to Saindhavāyana. Saindhava gave that to Muñjakeśa and it was again made into two. The best vikalpanas of the sāmhitās are the Nakṣatrakalpa, Vaitāna, Sāmhitāvidhi, Aṅgirās's kalpa and Śāntikalpa.

This account of the Vedic schools has brought them well into the Brāhmaṇa period, and the chronology of that period may be considered. The great Brāhmaṇas<sup>7</sup> were composed in the country of the Kurus or allied Kuru-Pañcālas,<sup>1</sup> hence the fusion of those two peoples is important, which occurred more than a century after the Bhārata battle or about 820 B.C. (p. 285).

The Pañcavimśa and Taittirīya Brāhmaṇas are the most archaic of the regular Brāhmaṇas.<sup>2</sup> The Pañcavimśa, though its home apparently lay farther east, yet contains a minute description of sacrifices performed on the rivers Sarasvatī and Dṛṣadvatī, and has no allusion to the Kuru-Pañcālas; hence it was apparently composed before the blending,<sup>3</sup> and while the Kurus still reigned at Hastinā-pura and over Kurukṣetra (say) about 830 B.C. The Taittirīya refers to the united Kuru-Pañcālas,<sup>4</sup> and was therefore composed after the fusion, (say) soon after 800 B.C. A more recent group is formed by the Jaiminīya, the Kauśītaki and the Aitareya Brāhmaṇas. The first of these is probably the oldest, while the third seems, on linguistic grounds at least, to be the latest of the three.<sup>5</sup> The Śatapatha is posterior to these. Latest of all are the Gopatha Brāhmaṇa and the short Brāhmaṇas of the Sāmaveda.<sup>6</sup> All these would be posterior to the fusion of the Kurus and Pañcālas, and so the Jaiminīya refers repeatedly to the Kuru-Pañcālas, and they are mentioned in the Śatapatha and Gopatha.<sup>7</sup> The Brāhmaṇa period ended apparently before or about 600 B.C.;<sup>8</sup> hence the Śatapatha may be placed somewhat before that date, and it will probably not be far wrong to put the Jaiminīya, the Kauśītaki and the Aitareya about half-way between the Taittirīya and the Śatapatha, in the last quarter of the eighth century and the first quarter of the seventh, the Jaiminīya first and the Aitareya third.

By the end of the seventh century B.C., the original Puranas had been compiled as shown in chapter IV, and the old traditions became known to a certain extent to the recluse brahmans who composed the Brāhmaṇas (pp. 10, 63): hence the Śatapatha notices much legend, though seemingly with doubtful success.<sup>9</sup> The fact that the Brāhmaṇas make no reference to the Pāṇḍavas or the Bhārata battle has been explained;<sup>1</sup> and the reason why the Bharatas are not mentioned in the geographical lists of the Aitareya Brāhmaṇa, in Manu, or in the Buddhist texts,<sup>2</sup> is simply that the term Bhārata had become too wide for particular use, as noticed in p. 293. The futility of expecting to find secular history in the Brāhmaṇas, which are purely priestly literature, is emphasized by the fact that they take very little notice even of contemporary kings.

The foregoing succession of teachers of the Vedic schools during the Brāhmaṇa period may be supplemented by notices of various brahmans who were contemporary. Many are mentioned in Vedic literature and in the Mahābhārata and Puranas, but generally in brahmanic statements without definite historical connexions:<sup>3</sup> yet here may be noticed certain of them on whom light can be thrown so as to suggest their mutual, and approximately real, positions.

A near relative probably of the Pāṇḍavas' purohita Dhaumya was Āyoda Dhaumya, who lived in the time of their successor Parikṣit II and his son Janamejaya III.<sup>4</sup> He had three disciples, Upamanyu, Āruni Uddālaka Pāñcālyā and Veda. Veda became Janamejaya's purohita.<sup>5</sup> Uddālaka<sup>6</sup> was son of Aruṇa Aupaveśi Gautama. Aruṇa had learnt of Upaveśa and of Aśvapati<sup>7</sup> prince of the Kekayas, who instructed also Prācīnaśāla Aupamanyava. Uddālaka learnt also of Patañcala Kāpya (p. 250). He was contemporary with Svaidāyana Śaunaka and Sauceya Prācīnayogya,<sup>8</sup> and he or his son Auddālaka were contemporary with that Prācīnaśāla, four other brahmans and Aśvapati.<sup>1</sup> Uddālaka had a son begotten of his wife by a disciple at his request, Śvetaketu Auddālaki Āruneya.<sup>2</sup> He had a favourite disciple Kahoḍa (Kausītaki<sup>3</sup>) and gave him his daughter Sujātā in marriage, and their son was Aṣṭāvakra. Kahoḍa was vanquished by Vandin in a controversy before king 'Janaka' and was drowned. Śvetaketu and Aṣṭāvakra, uncle and nephew, were of the same age and were brought up in Uddālaka's hermitage. When Aṣṭāvakra learnt of his father's fate, they both went to Janaka Ugrasena Puṣkaramālin and overcame Vandin.<sup>4</sup> Contemporary with Śvetaketu were the Pañcāla king Pravāhana Jaivala<sup>5</sup> and Jala Jātukarṇya.<sup>6</sup>

It is said Śvetaketu, who was reckoned a rishi,<sup>7</sup> established strict monogamy for women, in relation to brahman women.<sup>8</sup> It is amazing that such a story should have been fabricated and preserved, if not true; and if true, it would indicate that laxity among brahmans (which various stories suggest in early times) did not disappear till some time later than the Bhārata battle.<sup>9</sup>

Uddālaka had as pupils Yājñavalkya Vājasaneyā<sup>10</sup> and Protī Kausurubindi. The Vājasaneyā school was established in or by Janamejaya III's time (p. 324). Yājñavalkya had Āsuri as pupil.<sup>1</sup> Āsuri's first disciple was Pañcaśikha, who was of Parūṣara's gotra, was a bhikṣu,<sup>2</sup> and was called Kāpileya (it is said) after his foster-mother Kapilā and shortly Kapila by the Sāṅkhyas.<sup>3</sup> He went to Janaka Janadeva, king of Mithilā, and the king gave up his hundred teachers and followed Pañcaśikha, who taught him mokṣa according to the Sāṅkhya;<sup>4</sup> and Janaka Dharmadhvaja also was his disciple.<sup>5</sup> Two stages below Āsuri was Āsurāyana, with whom Yāska was contemporary.<sup>6</sup> This Yajñavalkya also taught Madhuka Paīṅga, he taught Cūḍa Bhāgavitti, he Jānaki Āya-sthūṇa, and he Satyakāma Jābāla.<sup>7</sup>

In a chronological succession of teachers are named (downwards)—Upaveśi, Aruṇa, Uddalaka, Yajñavalkya, Āsuri and Āsurāyana:<sup>8</sup> and Vodhu (or Vodha), Kapila, Āsuri and Pañcaśikha are mentioned as connected teachers,<sup>9</sup> treating Kapila and Pañcaśikha as distinct.

These particulars yield something like a chronological scheme, and all the more important of these teachers<sup>10</sup> are shown in the following table, which is in continuation of those on pages 148–9 and 192. It starts with teachers contemporary with the Pāṇḍavas, Parīkṣit II and Janamejaya III, and nearly all the persons in the first four columns are connected by synchronisms. There are few synchronisms touching the teachers in columns 5–8, yet something may be done to estimate their positions, for the notice of some of them in the Brāhmaṇas would no doubt warrant the inference that such a person flourished well before the Brāhmaṇa which mentions him, at least a quarter of a century prior. The steps are numbered as far as 100, but beyond that there are no clear royal synchronisms to mark definite steps.

Thus the Taittiriya Brähmana shows that Aruṇa Aupavesi<sup>1</sup> lived well before 800 B.C., and the synchronisms coupled with the date of the Bhārata battle assign him to the early half of the ninth century B.C. Similarly the Jaiminīya shows that Yajñavalkya Vājasaneyā lived well before 725, and his position in the table places him more than a century earlier. The Śatapatha notices Uddalaka, Śvetaketu, Śākalya, Āsuri, Madhuka, Prācīnayoga and Satyakāma, and shows that Satyakāma, the latest of them, lived well before 600 B.C. The Kauśitaki mentions Uddalaka, Śvetaketu and Madhuka, and fixes their time closer in that Madhuka, the latest of these, lived well before 700. The most effective indication is that to the Tāṇḍins belonged the Tāṇḍya or Pañcavimśa Brähmana of the Sāmaveda,<sup>2</sup> so that Tāṇḍiputra and all the prior teachers of that Veda in column 7 were anterior to 830 B.C.

If then we work on these inferences according to the sequence in the table and with the scale proposed at page 182, we may estimate the periods when the teachers flourished, except as regards those of the Atharvaveda for whom there are no synchronisms. In the ninth century B.C. flourished Uddalaka in the first quarter, Śvetaketu about the middle, and Śākalya and Tāṇḍiputra in the third quarter. In the eighth century Āsuri and Madhuka at the beginning, Pañcasikha in the middle, and Asurāyana and Yāska in the fourth quarter. In the seventh century Satyakāma in the second quarter. This estimate for Pañcasikha agrees with Buddhist legends, which speak of him as long prior to Buddha.<sup>3</sup>

The account of the Vedic schools shows that Vyāsa's successors exercised individual liberty in dealing with the text of the Vedas as arranged by him, and so there grew up a multitude of modifications which constituted different 'uses'. Five Puranas explain briefly how that happened.<sup>4</sup> The differences arose from the idiosyncrasies (dr̥ṣṭi-vibhrama) of the various teachers, and consisted in their arrangement of the mantras and Brähmanas and in their transposition of tones and syllables (svara-varṇa), but the essential text itself remained fixed apparently.<sup>1</sup> The multiplicity and variance of the different uses must have worked their own remedy in the gradual selection of the best versions and the elimination of the rest, until at length one use became generally accepted as the established Samhitā text.<sup>2</sup> The table shows that the growth of diversities continued during at least eight successions of teachers, that is, nearly two centuries according to the above estimated dates. The reverse process could hardly have taken much less time. The two processes therefore probably occupied nearly four centuries, and this may be suggested as one reason why 'the Samhitā text did not come into existence till after the completion of the Brāhmaṇas' or about 600 B.C.<sup>3</sup>

Moreover, when we compare the teachers in column 4 with those in columns 5-8, we notice that there is no agreement between the two classes (except perhaps as regards No. 100, 'Yājñavalkya')<sup>4</sup> until we reach Āsuri and Āsurāyana. This want of agreement is entirely what should be expected, because the Vedic schools could not have dominated all the religious teachers forthwith, and had gradually to make good their special province and authority, each as regards its own Veda. That process would have been slow, not only because of religious conservatism and jealousy,<sup>5</sup> but also because the multiplicity of competing versions would have weakened their prerogative. It would have required a long time; and the table shows that from Vyāsa's disciples to Āsuri (when the influence began to appear) was more than a century and a half. During that period religious teachers of the old order would have continued to flourish independently alongside the growing Vedic schools, and that is what column 4 shows.<sup>6</sup> The two streams of teaching would have persisted, with gradually diminishing difference, even longer than that, and may not have blended till the close of the Brāhmaṇa period. Hence that condition may be suggested as another cause why 'the Samhitā text did not come into existence till after the completion of the Brāhmaṇas'.

Here notice of historical tradition on the religious side closes, for the Puranas and epic contain nothing noteworthy about later teachers. Their account stops with Āsurāyana, who has been assigned to about the end of the eighth century B.C. It was drawn up by the Puranic brahmans as mentioned above, and the fact that they continued the lines of religious teachers, beyond the stage where their secular tradition closed (p. 57), down to about 700 B.C. with precise statements, and allude to nothing later personal except to Buddha curtly or vaguely, indicates that those additions were made then as a second stage while personal knowledge was fresh. Not long afterwards Jainism and Buddhism challenged the supremacy of the brahmans, and no traditions about later teachers were added. Secular chronicles preserved knowledge of the dynasties and kings who reigned in the chief countries, and were incorporated in the Bhavisya Purana, and copied later into the Matsya<sup>1</sup> and other Puranas in the third century A.D. and afterwards (p. 50). Religious tradition about the same period would seem to have become too scanty, uncertain or confused amid the religious conflicts to gain admittance into the Puranas.

Ancient tradition was compiled into the original Purana about the ninth century B.C., later religious historical tradition was added till the end of the eighth century B.C., and the chronicles of the kings of the Kali age were incorporated in the Puranas in prophetic guise down to the early part of the fourth century A.D. Such were the three main stages of the compilation of historical tradition in the Puranas.
